Servetus did not appear alarmed at the threats of his adversary, and when it was announced to him that the vice bailiff of Vienne had demanded his surrender, he threw himself at the feet of his judges, beseeching them to retain him in Geneva. These infamous magistrates appeared to accede to his demand, and at the same time instructed Calvin to extract from the works of the accused, the propositions which he considered condemnable. They then handed to Servetus the memoir drawn up by the reformer, that he might reply to it.

Instead of doing as he was ordered, the courageous Michael contented himself with adding marginal notes, some of which were injurious epithets, and he declared that he would not dispute with Calvin, except before the council of two hundred. The judges, taking no notice of this, finished the proceedings in the trial, and sent copies to Zurich, Berne, Basle and Schaffhausen, to procure the advice of the protestant ministers of those cities, all of whom were disciples of Calvin. Michael Servetus was declared guilty by each of them; still no one pronounced penalty of death on him. And yet, disgrace to Calvin, on the 26th of October, 1553, the tribunal, yielding to his urgent solicitations, assembled for the last time, and condemned the accused to be burned alive.

When this sentence was announced to him, Servetus demanded to see the reformer, and had an interview of two hours with him. It is said that he sought to awaken some sentiment of equity in the heart of his implacable foe; that he represented to him, that his death would be an ineffable blot on him, which he could never wash out; that he sought to show him that the interests of his doctrine required of him, to attach to himself all who were striving against the papacy. Nothing could change the determination of Calvin, and on the next day Michael Servetus, the anti-trinitarian, was executed at a place called Champey, a little distance from the southern gate of Geneva.

The reformer afterwards endeavoured to justify his judicial crime, and published a work, in which he established the right of putting heretics to death. This book appeared at the very moment when the protestants were making just complaints against the barbarous treatment to which they were exposed in Roman Catholic countries. The court of Rome seized on the arguments of its dreaded adversary, to justify its bloody proscriptions, and in this point of view, the punishment of Servetus was a happy incident for it.

In England another still more important event was accomplished; the young Edward the Sixth, the son of Henry the Eighth, was dead, and the princess Mary, his sister, the daughter of Catharine of Arragon, had succeeded him. This queen, a devoted Catholic, was no sooner on the throne, than she recalled the Jesuits into Great Britain, abolished protestantism, which had been declared the religion of the state by her brother, Edward the Sixth, and commenced persecutions against the protestants. She then sent, as a deputy to his holiness, John Francis Commandon, a young Italian poet, who stood very high in her good graces, to hand a confidential letter to Julius the Third, and to inform him, that with the aid of God, she hoped soon to replace England in its obedience to the court of Rome. She also informed him of her plan of uniting the crowns of Spain and England, by her marriage with the son of Charles the Fifth.

The pope, perceiving that this marriage would make England a dependency of the house of Austria, was much disturbed by it, and took at once energetic measures to prevent its conclusion. He sent the cardinal Pole, the personal enemy of the emperor, to England, with the title of legate. This prelate started with the more hope of success in his mission, since he had formerly been the confessor of Mary, and knew that the queen placed great confidence in him. But Charles the Fifth foreseeing the opposition which the court of Rome would make to his plan, kept on his guard, and did not hesitate to arrest the cardinal Pole on his journey through Germany, and to retain him as a prisoner against the laws of nations, without troubling himself about the safe-conduct he had obtained from his ambassador. The only favour he granted the prelate was, from a regard to his diplomatic character, to have him conducted to court, where he never lost sight of him, until the marriage of Philip and Mary had been celebrated. His majesty then set him at liberty, loaded him with honours, and permitted him to continue his journey to England.

Pole was received at London with great distinction. The chancellor of the kingdom, with a brilliant train of lords, came to receive him on his disembarkation, and conducted him to the palace, where the king and queen awaited him on the threshold of the door, in order to do him more honour. Some days after his arrival, the cardinal legate was introduced to parliament by the steward of the queen's household, four knights of the order of the garter, and an equal number of bishops. The two assembled chambers promised to revoke all laws passed against the authority of the Holy See, and he, in his turn, pronounced the absolution of the schism, which the whole assembly received kneeling, Philip and Mary setting the example. A pompous embassy was then sent to the court of Rome, to announce to the pontiff the reconciliation of England with the church, and to ask his approval of the renunciation of the royalty of Naples in favour of his son Philip, which Charles the Fifth had made.

Julius ratified the cession, granting, however, the investiture only on condition that the new king should produce, within a year, the license in favour of his right; that he should do homage to the church, and should acknowledge, in express terms, that the kingdom of Naples, and all the country situated beyond the light house, and up to the frontiers of the ecclesiastical states, except the city of Beneventum and its territory, had been granted to him and his heirs and successors, solely by the liberality and favour of the apostolic see, without prejudice, however, to the rights of the princess Joanna, queen of Spain and the two Sicilies.

The Jesuits, who had laboured so successfully for the conversion of England, were rewarded by dignities as ridiculous as illusory. John Maynez, a Portuguese, was made patriarch of Congo; the father Oviédo received the title of bishop of Nicæa, and Father Garnerio that of Hierapolis. His holiness had some time before recompensed in the same way, those who had been missionaries in Asia and Africa, among others St. Francis Xavier, who had been created patriarch of the Indies.

If the Jesuits made great progress in America, the Indies, and Congo, it was not so in Europe, for, with the exception of England, no nation was willing to receive them. Thus, in France, they were rejected by the people, the clergy, the parliament, and even the Sorbonne, that body which afterwards evinced such docility and complacency for them, when they became the confessors of kings. The Jesuits had inherited for several years the property of William Duprat, their protector, and they asked in vain for letters patent from Henry the Second to take possession of their legacy. At length, the king, yielding to the solicitations of the cardinal of Lorraine, consented to give them authority to take possession of their inheritance, provided they would employ the funds, in accordance with the wishes of the legatee, in the foundation of a college. But when these letters patent were presented to the parliament to be registered, the members of that assembly protested against the establishment of a new religious order, maintaining that the number of convents in France was already too great. This opposition was strongly aided by the curates, whose rights the Jesuits usurped, and by the bishops, who were jealous at seeing them freed from their jurisdiction.

The Jesuits did not regard themselves defeated; they solicited new letters from the king, and presented a second request to parliament, which they took care to have backed by Catherine de Medicis and Diana of Poitiers, whose consciences they directed. They were again foiled in their effort, and sent before the Sorbonne. That assembly having taken up the matter, discussed it at length, and on the 1st of December, 1554, made the following decree:—"We declare this new society, which proudly styles itself the company of Jesus, to be impious and sacrilegious, because it receives into its bosom, with indifference and silence, all kinds of persons, no matter how infamous they are; because it possesses privileges dangerous to the administration of penance and the liberty of teaching; because it wishes to build up schools to the injury of the bishops; because it sets itself above the hierarchical order of the regular and secular clergy, and even beyond the jurisdiction of temporal princes and the universities. We also declare, that this society cannot but engender troubles and schisms in the states into which it shall be introduced; that it will annihilate the liberty of thought, to subject consciences to the pope; and, finally, that it will be equally redoubtable to kings as to people."

To strengthen this decision of the Sorbonne, the bishop of Paris, Eustache de Bellay, added a request for the exclusion of Jesuits from his diocese. The result was, that the disciples of Loyola were placed under interdict, and driven from the capital, notwithstanding the letters patent of the king. They then retired to the quarter of St. Germain, under the protection of the prior of the abbey, who maintained that he was independent of the bishop, from some private privilege. It was not in France only that the Jesuits were execrated. In Spain even, they had not yet been able to establish themselves on a solid basis, and were rather tolerated than protected at the court of Madrid; Charles the Fifth never admitted them to his private counsels, and was contented with employing them in his American dominions. In England, notwithstanding the support of the queen, they were not acceptable to the lords, the people, or the clergy.—George Broussel, archbishop of Dublin, thus spoke of them in a sermon:—"A new congregation has arisen among us, which styles itself the company of Jesus, and proclaims itself the militia of the pope. These satellites of the pontifical tyranny live like the scribes and pharisees, and seek to replace truth by falsehood, light by darkness. They will, no doubt, obtain their ends, my brethren, by reason of their astuteness, which clothes them with a multitude of forms to be combatted; with the pagans they adore idols, with the atheists they deny God, with the Israelites they profess Judaism, with the protestants they call themselves reformers; and all this is done to discover the plans, thoughts, inclinations of their enemies, to lead men into the way of perdition, to induce them to say, 'There is no other God, but the pope.' They spread themselves over the whole earth, and obtain admittance to the counsels of princes, the more surely to rule the nations, to subjugate humanity, to bend it beneath the yoke of the bishops of Rome. But we hope that God will, one day, grow weary of such abominations, and will permit these miserable Jesuits to be pursued by those who have lent them assistance, by the popes themselves, for whom they have drunk every shame; we hope that these satellites of Satan will become more miserable than the Jews, and that their name will be spit upon and reviled; we hope that they will be regarded as the most degraded and the most subject of the human race." This very remarkable prediction, which was accomplished in every particular, dates in the middle of the sixteenth century, some years after the foundation of the order.

The opinion of the English prelates had no influence, however, on their queen, and the bigot Mary, resolved to constrain her subjects to restore the tithes claimed by Julius the Third.

The Germans were not so docile; not only did they refuse to give any satisfaction to the holy father, but even declared their determination to assemble in a general council at Augsburg, to decree the liberty of conscience which had been guaranteed to them by the emperor, by the treaty of Passau, without any reference either to an œcumenical synod or a national council. The diet having been held at Augsburg, the Germans published a decree, which declared perfect equality between the Catholics and Lutherans, guaranteed to the protestant laity, legal proprietorship in the property taken from the Catholic clergy, and permitted those who had, up to this time, remained faithful to the Roman court, even priests, to embrace Lutheranism and marry. From that time the protestant religion was regarded as the religion of the empire.

When this news reached Rome, it caused a profound sensation; the pontiff had such a fit of passion that it brought on a violent fever, and as he was already very sick, in consequence of his excesses at table, he could not support this new shock, and died on the 23d of March, 1555.

MARCEL THE SECOND, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1555:]

Election of the cardinal of Santa Croix—His history before his pontificate—Commencement of his reign—His zeal for reform—He desires to institute a military order—His plan for the redress of abuses in the government of the church—His death and eulogy.

As soon as the funeral of Julius the Third was over, the thirty-seven cardinals who were at Rome, entered the conclave, and proclaimed the cardinal of Santa Croix supreme chief of the church, by the name of Marcel the Second. He came originally from Fano or Monte Fano, a small town situated on a high mountain between Osimo and Macerata; his father, whose name was Richard Cervin, of Monte Pulciano, was the apostolic treasurer or receiver for the Holy See, in the March of Ancona.

Marcel studied in the city of Sienna; having reached manhood, he went to Rome, where Clement the Seventh conferred on him some subaltern employments. On the advent of Paul the Third, he had been appointed first secretary to the apostolic chamber; afterwards the cardinal Farnese attached him to him in the capacity of secretary of legation, when he was ambassador to the court of Henry the Second, and on his departure from France, had left him to continue the negotiations between the Holy See and the king. As he succeeded as the sovereign pontiff desired, Paul the Third gave him, on his return, the hat of a cardinal and the bishoprics of Nicastro, Reggio, and Eugubio.

Some days after his exaltation, Marcel received the pontifical crown from the hands of the cardinal de Bellay, who was then at Rome; but instead of spending, as his predecessors had done, enormous sums in artificial fêtes, illuminations, festivals, and concerts, he disributed among the poor all the money which he found in the apostolic treasury. He was then occupied with the introduction of useful reforms into the administration of the government of the church, and as he was convinced that the only mode of restoring consideration to the papacy was, to change the system pursued by his predecessors, he announced that he should exact from the officers and great dignitaries of the court of Rome, the practice of the virtues taught by Christ. The pontiff also informed the sacred college, of his intention to form an order of knights, chosen alike from the highest and lowest classes of society, to second him in his labours, and with a well-formed resolution, to admit none into it who had not merited the great distinction, either by real talent or by their virtues. His holiness counted on using these knights for embassies, legations, negotiations with sovereigns, and all matters which were important to the Holy See, in case the cardinals should evince hostility to his generous plans. He then disbanded the guards of the Vatican, saying, that the vicar of Christ had no need to be surrounded by soldiers; that it was disgraceful for a sovereign, and especially for a pope, to be surrounded by wretches whose business was to murder their fellows; that it was better for a virtuous pontiff to be put to death by the wicked, than to give a proof of pride and cowardice, and to wish to impose on people by terror.

He drove from his court all the courtiers who were called valets; he suppressed the pensions which were allotted to them; finally, every thing, even to his table, underwent important reforms; the number of dishes which were to be served up to him was limited, as well as the duration of the repast. The gold and silver service was suppressed and sold to pay the debts of the Holy See. Marcel had such a disgust for flattery, that he one day informed the auditors of the rota, who came to pay their respects to him whilst he was at table, that he wished they would employ themselves with the care of their churches, and not lose their time in making useless bows; and as one of them, when retiring, uttered some murmurs, he exclaimed, "What, is the Holy See so covered with thorns and sown with briars, that we cannot follow the right path without being pricked at every step? Is it then true that one cannot reconcile the care of his own safety, with a dignity so fatal as that of the head of the church?"

A virtuous pope could not live long; thus Marcel died, after a reign of twenty-one days, on the 30th of April, 1555, from an attack of apoplexy, according to some ecclesiastical authors, or from the consequences of a poisoned beverage, if we are to believe the testimony of contemporary historians.

The death of the venerable Marcel adds new force to the fact we have already pointed out in the course of this history; it is, that among the small number of holy prelates who have occupied the chair of the apostle, none has been able to preserve the tiara long enough to put in execution plans of reform among the clergy or the ecclesiastical orders, and that all, without exception, have perished by a violent death.

Are we then to conclude, that in order to be pope, one must possess every vice, and have committed every crime? Are we to suppose that cardinals and princes of the church only regard those popes worthy of their admiration, who sacrifice duchies and kingdoms to their bastards; or those who compose their courts of but minions and harlots; or those who abandon themselves to the most shameful debaucheries; or those, finally, who, like hyenas, delight in the sight of dead bodies, and bathe in blood? Alas! is it not but too true, that in the eyes of the adorers of the Roman purple and of the satellites of the theocracy, the greatest popes are those who, during their lives, have yearly swallowed up millions in the pleasures of the table or debaucheries; or even still more, those who have burned on the funeral pyres of the inquisition whole people, and who have invented new torments to add to the already so frightful sufferings of their victims.

PAUL THE FOURTH THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1555.]

Election of Paul the Fourth—His history before his pontificate—He increases the power of the inquisitors—Death and epitaph of Ignatius Loyola—His holiness demands from Queen Mary the restitution of the property taken from the church—League between the pope and France—Pride and insolence of the pontiff—His hypocrisy and dissimulation—He opposes the abdication of Charles the Fifth—Legation of the cardinal Caraffa, nephew of the pope, to the court of France—Persecutions of the Colonna—Paul the Fourth rekindles the war in Italy—Disgrace of Cardinal Pole—Violent accusations against the reformed of France—Proceeding of the pope against his nephews—Insolence of Paul the Fourth to Queen Elizabeth of England—Quarrel between the emperor and the pope—His holiness burns protestant books—His death.

As soon as the death of the holy pope Marcel was known in England, ambassadors immediately started from London, to procure the election of Cardinal Pole as sovereign pontiff, he being, unquestionably, the ecclesiastic who was most capable of filling the Holy See; but though they used all diligence, they could not reach there in time, and when they arrived in Rome the cardinal Chieti had already obtained a majority of the suffrages in the college, and had been proclaimed pope by the name of Paul the Fourth.

The new pontiff, John Peter Caraffa, was born at Naples, of a family originally from Hungary. He had entered a convent of Dominicans in his earliest youth, where he had imbibed the cruel and inexorable character, which was the distinctive badge of that order of monks. When he had finished his studies he went to Rome, to the cardinal Oliver Caraffa, his cousin, who initiated him into the intrigues of the apostolic court, and recommended him to Julius the Second. The pope gave him the bishopric of Chieti, and sent him to the city of Naples, to congratulate Ferdinand the Catholic on his arrival in the kingdom. Leo the Tenth then gave him the appointment of nuncio to England, with the charge of collecting Peter's pence; for three years he pillaged the kingdom of England; after this he was sent to Spain, to Ferdinand, whose good will he obtained by the ingenious modes which he taught him of increasing the number of the victims of the inquisition, and consequently his treasures. Adrian the Sixth recalled him to Rome, and entrusted him with important offices. During the pontificate of Clement the Seventh, he created the order of the Theatins, to combat the heretics; but this institution of religious was eclipsed by that of the Jesuits, and he himself abandoned them to become the protector of the company of Jesus. At last Paul the Third gave him a cardinal's hat, in testimony of his gratitude, and as a recompense for the assistance he had given him in establishing the tribunals of the inquisition of Italy. He finally became grand inquisitor at Rome, and presided over that odious tribunal, which was called the nerve of the power of the Holy See.

As soon as he was crowned, Paul the Fourth occupied himself in giving new energy to the religious persecutions; he increased the prisons, doubled the number of the judges, and took measures to give the executioners no repose. He first published a bull of excommunication against those who separated themselves, by the slightest word, from the doctrine professed by the Roman Catholic church; he then pronounced the most terrible spiritual and temporal penalties which had ever yet been promulgated against the faithful who were suspected of heresy; he declared that princes, kings, emperors, bishops, archbishops, and even cardinals should be put to the torture and led upon the scaffold, if they were pronounced guilty by the holy office.

Such a beginning spread consternation through Christendom, and excited the indignation of the people and clergy; the Jesuits alone shouted forth the praises of the pontiff, and announced every where that the throne of the apostle was at last occupied by a great pope, who comprehended this sublime truth, "It is better to annihilate mankind, than permit it to continue in error." His holiness evinced gratitude to his satellites; he loaded them with honours and wealth; built, in the enclosure of the city, two superb colleges for them, called the Roman and the German, and gave them magnificent villas in the environs. It was in the midst of all these triumphs that Ignatius Loyola died, exhausted by fatigue and sickness. Afterwards, one of the successors of Paul called him blest, and another, Gregory the Fifteenth, placed him in the ranks of the saints. His disciples inscribed this proud inscription on his tomb: "Thou who regardest Pompey, the great Cæsar, and Alexander, as extraordinary beings, open thy eyes to the truth, and thou wilt see that Ignatius has been greater than all these conquerors."

After the death of Loyola, the learned Jesuit Laynez, one of his cherished disciples, was chosen to succeed him in the generalship of the order.

Paul was then occupied in giving an audience to the ambassadors of Queen Mary, who were commissioned to take the oath of fidelity between the hands of his holiness. The English deputies were received in a public consistory, and constrained to a humiliating ceremonial; they were compelled to kiss the feet of the pope, to place themselves before him on their knees, and to confess to him in this position, one by one, all the alleged crimes of the English nation against the papacy. They avowed humbly that their fellow subjects had paid with ingratitude the kindness of the sovereign pontiff, and they demanded absolution for their transgressions. Paul, satisfied with their abasement, then permitted them to rise, and received the letters of Mary from them; but he no sooner perceived, on opening the letter, that the princess styled herself queen of England and Ireland, than he fell into a rage, exclaiming, that their mistress was very bold to dare to take the title of queen of Ireland without the authority of the pope; and he at once drove them from the Vatican.

In this same session his holiness created three cardinals out of his own family; among others one of his great nephews, who was scarcely sixteen years old, and whom he had already made archbishop of Naples. As the cardinal of St. James wished to make some observations on this, and to represent to the pope that he had not kept the engagements he had made at the time of his election, Paul, who was vigorous and active, sprang from his seat, caught the prelate by his hood, tore him from his seat, dragged him into the midst of the room, and struck him so hard a blow that the blood gushed forth and inundated his face and garments. After this scene of outrage, the cardinals retired tumultuously, and announced that they would not appear again in the consistory; the fear of punishment, however, caused their resolution to fail, and the usual sessions were recommenced.

Since their expulsion from the Vatican, the English ambassadors had avoided appearing before the pope; but an order from their cowardly sovereign soon constrained them to make new approaches to his holiness, to obtain a brief for the investiture of Ireland; this act of degradation cost the people of England two hundred thousand crowns. The bull was given by the holy father to the envoys of Queen Mary at a solemn audience, who also gave them his blessing. Paul added, however, before dismissing them: "It is as a testimony of the paternal affection we have for Mary and Philip, that we erect Ireland into a kingdom, in the exercise of the supreme power which we have from God, who has placed us above thrones and nations. We, however, reserve to ourselves the revocation of the decree of investiture, if your queen does not hasten to restore to the clergy all the property which has been taken from them, and if she does not cause Peter's pence to be paid; for we will be forced to place Great Britain under interdict to show the English that the apostle will not open to them the gates of heaven, if they have the sacrilegious audacity to retain his patrimony on earth."

Notwithstanding this threat of interdict, the English lords refused to consent to restore the church property, and the fanatical Mary dared not employ violence to constrain them; she contented herself with restoring to the church the domains which her father, Henry the Eighth, and her brother, the young Edward the Fourth, had seized and united to the crown property. Perhaps we may attribute the coldness which the queen showed, to the influence which Philip, her husband, exercised over her, who was already advised of the threats of the court of Rome, and of the ambitious projects of the new pope on the kingdom of Naples.

In fact, his holiness, under the pretext of wishing to deprive the protestants of the privileges granted them in the last diet of Augsburg, broke with Charles the Fifth, and openly sought the alliance of Henry the Second. At the same time the cardinal, Charles Caraffa, and his brother John, his nephews, whom he had created, the one, duke of Palliano, the other, captain general of the church, as well as his third nephew, Antonio, who was in possession of the marquisate of Montebello, taken from the counts Guidi, secretly united their troops and prepared to invade the kingdom of Naples, which Mendoza then governed. Fortunately, the spies of the emperor informed him of what was preparing against him, and he had time to write to his son Philip, to send the duke of Alba at once into Italy, with the title of viceroy, to replace Mendoza.

The duke started at once for Italy, and went to Rome under the pretence of congratulating the pope on his exaltation in the name of Charles the Fifth, but in reality to sound the intentions of his holiness. He was not long in discovering the true sentiments of Paul, for the pontiff interrupted him as soon as he commenced speaking, broke out upon the emperor, pronounced him a traitor and a felon, and ordered the viceroy to leave Rome immediately. He did not disobey his holiness, and as he was fearful of being arrested, he vaulted on his horse on quitting the Vatican, and gained the open country. He sent a relation of what had occurred at once to Philip, that he might understand that a rupture between the courts of Rome and Madrid, was imminent.

This hatred of Paul to the emperor was increased by the information conveyed to him by the cardinal Caraffa, of a pretended conspiracy organised by the Spaniards, and whose object was an attempt upon his person. He no longer preserved any bounds in his attacks on Charles the Fifth and his son; not being able to reach them, he seized on their partisans; he cast into the dungeons of the inquisition Camillus Colonna, who was accused of favouring the Spanish party; he proscribed his family, and confiscated the property of this illustrious house; he arrested the couriers of the emperor and King Philip, who had to pass through his states, and opened the despatches addressed to the duke of Alba; he then assembled troops and seized on Palliano and Neptune, which belonged to the Colonna.

These first hostilities were followed up by a declaration of war against Charles the Fifth, and the holy father, who wished, after the example of his predecessors, to trample emperors beneath his feet, wrote to him: "That he would rather set the four corners of the world on fire, than yield any thing to him." The duke of Alba, however, who commanded a veteran army, soon invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, and the Spaniards were before the walls of Rome before Paul had dreamed of opposing any resistance to them.

His holiness turned to France, and promised to Henry the Second, the kingdom of Naples and the duchy of Milan, if he would promise to enter Italy to repel his enemies; moreover, as the pope knew that his majesty was very superstitious, and might object that the last treaty concluded with the emperor prevented him from taking up arms, under penalty of being regarded by the world as traitorous and perjured, he sent him a bull freeing him from his oaths.

Octavius Farnese, duke of Milan, who was a party to the same treaty, was unwilling to break it, either because he did not believe his conscience in safety, notwithstanding the authority of the pope, or because it was not to his interest to do so, as it was to that of the king of France; he thus incurred the penalty of excommunication, and he was anathematised by Paul the Fourth, on account of his refusal to unite with the French to fight the Spaniards, as he had formerly been by Paul the Third, for refusing to aid the Spaniards in making war on the French.

The sovereign pontiff also threatened King Philip with the ecclesiastical thunders if he did not abandon his pretensions on Naples in favour of his nephews. The prince, who was not desirous of detaching this magnificent kingdom from his crown, decided on a vigorous measure, and resolved to assemble at Pisa fourteen cardinals who had sold themselves to his agents, and who had promised to declare the election of the pope contrary to the holy canons, and to depose him as an intruder on the Holy See.

An extraordinary event arrested Philip in the execution of this plan; he received the news that his father, Charles the Fifth, had solemnly abdicated and surrendered to him the government of his immense kingdom. Henry the Second, dreading the consequences of a war with this prince, who was, from the emperor's abdication, the most powerful monarch in Europe, hastened to conclude a truce with Spain. But the obstinate pontiff was unwilling to accede to any proposition for an arrangement, and brought all the resources of his policy into play to prevent the conclusion of peace between France and Spain. The holy father first sent his nephew to present to Henry the Second, a sword and hat which had been blessed by him, and at the same time to renew the promise of the investiture of the kingdom of Naples. He then took a solemn engagement to make as many cardinals as his majesty desired, so to assure him a majority in the conclave, and to render certain the election of a French cardinal, if he died before the accomplishment of his vengeance on their common foe.

The cardinal of Caraffa had hardly arrived at Fontainebleau, where the king held his court, when he received information from the Jesuits, the natural spies of the pope, and learned from them, that if he wished to succeed at the court of France, he must obtain the support of the Guises, and flatter their ambition on account of the beautiful Diana of Poitiers, the dutchess of Valentinois, the mistress of the king, who was sold to them, body and soul; and that moreover, he should not neglect to get into the good graces of the marshal Strozzi, the queen's lover.

Caraffa conformed to the recommendations of the Jesuits, and thanks to their advice, he had, in a month after his arrival in France, again brought Henry into the party of the pope, and had induced him to declare war on Spain. He then accompanied the court to Paris, and was so successful in the conferences he had with Diana of Poitiers and Catharine de Medici, that the gallant cardinal became the lover of both of them. Thus when the queen gave birth to twin daughters, it was openly said that the king was a ridiculous husband and lover, and he was much blamed for permitting the cardinal to be the godfather and father of his daughters.

Whilst the nephew of his holiness was advancing his business at the court of France, he was repulsing the Spaniards from his states, and thanks to the intervention of the troops of Henry, he was in a condition to dictate his terms.

As it was his intention to cause division among his enemies, he availed himself of the abdication of Charles leaving the imperial dignity vacant, and declared by turns for Ferdinand and Philip, the two pretenders to the crown of Germany, in order to increase the difficulties. He at first appeared favourably disposed towards Ferdinand, the brother of Charles, and assisted his nomination with the electors to the prejudice of Philip; then when the German princes had proclaimed him the head of the empire, he receded from his first decision and refused to grant an audience to the ambassadors who came to announce it to him, declaring that he did not recognise the new emperor, since the abdication of Charles was not lawful without the authority of the Holy See.

Ferdinand immediately recalled the deputies who had been sent to Rome, and to punish the pope for his insolence, confirmed the diet of Augsburg, which assured the religious liberty of Germany. By way of reprisal, Paul assembled the most skilful theologians among the Jesuits, consulted them upon the measures to be taken concerning Charles the Fifth, and obtained this decision, entirely in conformity with his sentiments, to wit: "That God having given to St. Peter and his successors an absolute authority over the kingdom of heaven and the thrones of the earth, no emperor could lay aside the diadem without the permission of the pontiff,—that Charles had taken the oath of obedience to the Holy See, and could not abdicate without being perjured; that he consequently might be anathematised, interdicted, deposed, and burned as a heretic, if he did not continue to bear the weight of government on his shoulders, as long as the holy father judged it proper for the interests of the Holy See."

Paul then published a bull against Charles the Fifth, explaining at length the motives of God in prohibiting kings from choosing their successors, and concluded with this singular doctrine, that the free disposal of crowns belonged to the popes alone, as the supreme heads of the Christian republic. Such a declaration was equivalent to a manifesto of war, and without longer delay his holiness commenced hostilities against the house of Austria, and arrested, not only the ambassadors of Spain, but also those of England, on the pretext that Philip, having married their queen, they were necessarily in intercourse with the enemies of the Holy See. He levied troops every where and united them with those which the duke of Guise had brought him from France; he even took the protestants of the Grisons into his pay, and when it was represented to him what scandal his admittance of heretical soldiers into his army afforded the faithful, he replied, "What, is it bad? They will fight with the more bitterness to kill our Catholic enemies."

The persecutions against the Colonna were recommenced with extraordinary rigour; the partizans of that family were mercilessly torn from their dwellings, thrown into the prisons of the inquisition, and handed over to the executioners. No day passed in which the great square of Rome was not illuminated by new funeral pyres raised to consume the victims of pontifical tyranny. Unable to save their friends, Ascagnus Colonna and his son Mark Antony, desired at least to revenge them; they organised bands of Calabrian soldiers, and made incursions up to the very walls of Rome. These bold attacks excited still more the anger of the pope, who was unable to guard against them, his enemies always arriving suddenly and retreating into the territory of Naples when he took the offensive. Not being able to reach the Colonna, he resolved to alarm their protectors, and on the 23d of July, 1556, having assembled the cardinals in consistory, it was decreed, "That his holiness, after having excommunicated and placed under interdict Ascagnus Colonna and Mark Antony, should also prohibit all Christians from giving them assistance and asylum, under penalty of the same censures; that in defiance of this bull the emperor Charles the Fifth and his son Philip, having dared to furnish men and money to these children of perdition, were for that reason excommunicated, interdicted, and deposed, unless they immediately put an end to their relations with these enemies of the Holy See.

This manifesto changed in no wise the progress of affairs; Philip did not appear to be moved, nor Charles the Fifth, who had then retired into a convent. The duke of Alba demanded, with no less energy, the ambassadors whom Paul had thrown into the dungeons of the inquisition, threatening to march on Rome, if they were not immediately surrendered to him. Instead of obeying, the pope prepared to fight; he informed the duke that no fear of danger would prevent him from maintaining the dignity of the tiara; that Christ having confided to him the care of his flock, he knew how to defend it, and that moreover he placed the care of his triumph in the hands of God. Still his confidence in celestial succour was not such as to prevent his making certain useful dispositions in the event of a siege. He distributed arms to the citizens of Rome, divided them into companies, each under the orders of the chief of its quarter; he raised the old walls, furnished several neighbouring fortresses with cannon, and increased their garrisons. Montluc also led three thousand French troops to his aid, and the marshal Strozzi came to take the command of the troops destined for the defence of Rome, until the army he was forming beyond the Alps should enter Italy.

The duke of Alba, informed of all these things, sent to the pope, as a plenipotentiary, Pino Loffredi, marquis of Trevizo, to make a last effort for peace; but the ambassador had scarcely entered Rome, when he was arrested and thrown into the dungeons of the inquisition. This violation of the laws of nations exasperated the duke; he immediately crossed the land of Labour, and marched on the holy city to punish the pontiff. The latter, who was informed of the movement of the hostile army by the Spanish Jesuits, hastened the work on the fortifications, pulled down churches, razed convents, destroyed cemeteries, and was ready to repel the attacks of the assailants. On the other side, the duke of Guise approached Rome with his division, and came to concert with Paul on the plan of the campaign. As money was wanting, in consequence of the profuse expenditures of the nephews of the pope, and it was necessary to have some to send supplies to the army, his holiness sold at auction ten cardinal's hats, a great number of benefices, and made forced loans from the richest citizens. All these measures occasioned a delay of two months, and when the duke of Guise had obtained means to penetrate into the Abruzzo, to attack the Spaniards, he found that the duke of Alba had turned the flank of the French army, had fallen on the city of Signia, which he had carried by storm, and upon Palliano, which he was pressing vigorously, in order to gain a point on Rome. Whilst the duke of Guise was making war on the Abruzzo, King Henry was defeated at St. Quentin by the English, who had joined the party of the husband of their sovereign.

His majesty was then obliged to recall his army from Italy and leave the Holy See to the mercy of the Spaniards. Paul, irritated against the bigot Mary of England, the cause of the departure of his allies, wrote to her to reproach her for her cowardly complaisance towards her husband; and not being able to avenge himself on her, he let the whole weight of his anger fall on Cardinal Pole, the favourite of the queen. He lanced a decree against all the nuncios in Great Britain, and particularly against the cardinal Pole, whom he called a traitor to the church, because he had been unable to prevent the princess from declaring against France. In vain did the sacred college represent to him that such a step would compromise the authority of the apostolic see in Great Britain; he would not change his determination; he recalled the confessor of Mary, the Jesuit Payton, to the court of Rome, created him a cardinal, and gave him the legation of England. But the queen of England, who had until this time shown a stupid submission to the pope, refused now to obey him, and informed Payton, who was already on the way to his post, that she prohibited him from setting his foot in the kingdom, under penalty of his life. This order so alarmed the Jesuit cardinal, that it brought on a violent fever, of which he died some months afterwards.

The pontiff, however, relented nothing in his persecutions of Pole, and would not consent to listen to proposals for peace, until he found himself pressed by the imminence of the danger and the victories of the duke of Alba; he was even then unwilling to make any concession of his pride. His holiness demanded that the Spanish general should come to ask pardon from him for having pillaged the patrimony of the church, and beseech him, on his knees, to grant him absolution for his faults and those of his master, Philip. The conqueror, who saw that the pontiff was on the edge of the tomb, consented to this humiliating ceremony, and a peace was signed between Spain and the Holy See. From that day Paul became the enemy of France, of which he had no longer need, and sought to excite troubles in the kingdom, by accusing Henry the Second of favouring the reformed in his capital, and permitting them to hold assemblies.

The following fact gave rise to this extravagant accusation:—"During a night in autumn," says Mezerai, "the Jesuits were informed that about two hundred persons of the reformed religion of Calvin, were praying together in a private hotel in the faubourg St. Germain; they immediately collected a crowd before the house in which the heretics were, exclaiming scandal, abomination. The latter, alarmed by the yells of their enemies, wished to fly, but before they could do so, the doors were broken in, and the Catholics penetrated into their retreat, and arrested more than an hundred of these unfortunate persons, whom they dragged to the dungeons of the officialty."

The disciples of Loyola became their accusers, and produced against them accusations as strange as false; they said that the Calvinists roasted young children, and ate the flesh in their frightful repasts; after which men and women, in the obscurity of the night, were mixed up in horrible embraces; in fine, renewed against the reformed the accusations we have already related, against the ancient sects who separated from the primitive church. These calumnies sent a large number of protestants to the stake; some, however, obtained permission to appear before judges who were not under the influence of the Jesuits, and as, in the interval, the Swiss, the prince Palatine, and several electors, had addressed violent complaints to Henry the Second, threatening to withdraw from him the support of their arms, if he continued to persecute their co-religionists, he had been forced, having need of their assistance, to put an end to the persecutions.

This act of moderation had been loudly blamed by the court of Rome, and the pope, in a public audience which he gave the French ambassadors, did not hesitate to say to them:—"It was natural that affairs went badly in a kingdom, in which rigour was used towards the holy priests, to compel them to reside in their churches, as had been seen in the affair of the Jesuits, and in which the prince carried irreligion so far as to publish ordinances concerning the sacraments, and permitted himself to proscribe clandestine marriages. In fact," added the holy father, "your master inspires so profound a terror in the clergy of the Gallican church, that the ecclesiastics of his kingdom dare not even complain of his tyranny; but we who dread no power on this earth, we will undertake their defence; we will convene them in a general council in Italy, and we will prepare things for the trial of the despot called Henry the Second."

His holiness expressed himself with as little restraint concerning Queen Elizabeth, the daughter of Henry the Eighth and Anne Boleyn, who sent ambassadors to him, to inform him of the death of her sister Mary, and to notify him of her advent to the throne.

Paul received the deputies with inconceivable haughtiness; he declared to them, that he did not recognise Elizabeth as queen, since Great Britain was a fief of the Holy See; that the usurpation consummated by this woman was still more impious, as she herself was a bastard and had not the slightest right to the crown. This vapouring of the holy father determined the queen to withdraw from the obedience of the Holy See, and to recall her ambassadors from Rome; but Paul opposed their departure, and prohibited them from quitting his court.

Whilst the sovereign pontiff was so immoderately abusing his spiritual authority, his nephews were equally using, for the interests of their ambition, the temporal power which had been confided to them. Their spoliation became such, that complaints arose from all sides against them. They then wished to prevent the complaints of their victims from reaching the pope, and they surrounded him with creatures who kept him in a kind of private confinement. His holiness, whose impetuous character could not accommodate itself to any restraint, revolted against this excess of boldness, took violent measures against the members of his family, deprived them of all their dignities, and exiled them from Rome.

New ministers were installed in the Vatican, and placed under the presidency of Camillus Orsini and of the cardinals of Trani and Spoleto. Paul the Fourth abandoned to them the government of the church, only reserving to himself the administration of the inquisition, "that impregnable fortress of the papacy," as he called that execrable institution.

Whilst this proud, violent, and cruel old man was becoming embittered against the unfortunate reformed, and was putting them to the torture in the dungeons of the inquisition, the two kings of France and Spain were treating of peace, and were cementing their union by the double marriage of Elizabeth, the daughter of Henry the Second, with Philip the Second, and of his sister Margaret with the duke of Savoy. This peace was signed at Cateau Cambresis.

On learning the cessation of hostilities, Paul fell into a violent fit of anger and exclaimed, "It is all over with the power of the Holy See, Germany and England are for ever lost to us, and that through the fault of the cardinals, those vampires who think only of their own private interests, and nothing of that of the papacy. May the demons of hell, if there be any, carry them all to hell, with the kings of France and Spain, and with all my relatives! May they leave upon earth but people to oppress, Jesuits to defend me, and Dominicans to serve me." His holiness was in a grievous error, for the two kings had only concluded a treaty to enable them to act with more efficacy against heresy, and to conform to the pontiff's desires for extermination, which they soon made known by continuing a rigorous persecution of the protestants of their dominions. Henry the Second built heated chambers in all the cities of his kingdom, and Philip introduced legions of inquisitors into the Low Countries. This last prince even sent to Rome a theologian from the university of Louvain, to obtain from Paul precise rules as to the nature of the functions of the tribunals of the holy office, and the crimes of which they were to take cognizance. The sovereign pontiff then recovered some confidence in the success of his plans, and hastened to expedite bulls which authorised the establishment of the tribunals of the inquisition, as well as the regulations which were to be followed by the officers. His holiness was preparing to give new energy to the persecutions, when a fever of irritation freed Rome, on the 10th of August, 1559.

Scarcely had Paul the Fourth closed his eyes, when the people, no longer restrained by fear, rushed to arms, burned the palace of the inquisitors, delivered the prisoners from the holy office, demolished the new prisons, and even attempted to burn the convent of Minerva, which contained the Dominicans. Throughout the whole city, they threw down the statues of the deceased pope, broke his armorial bearings, and were scarcely restrained from executing a decree made at a meeting of the citizens, which ordered that his dead body should be dragged on a hurdle through the streets of the city, and then be cast into a sink.

x

PIUS THE FOURTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1559.]

Election of Pius the Fourth—His origin and character—Commencement of his pontificate—Elevation of his family—He persecutes the Caraffa—He recognises Ferdinand, the brother of Charles the Fifth, as the lawful emperor—Bull for the continuance of the synod of Trent—Letter from Catherine de Medicis to the pope—Opening of the new sessions of the council of Trent—League proposed by the pope—Cruelties committed in the city of Orange by the Catholics, at the instigation of his holiness—Council of Trent—Maximilian king of the Romans, refuses to take the oath of obedience to the pope—The king of France protects the queen of Navarre against the pope—Conspiracy of the Spaniards against that queen—France refuses to receive the acts of the council of Trent—Establishment of the Jesuits in that kingdom—Conspiracy against the pope—He labours to enrich his family—Concessions from the court of Rome to the protestants of Germany—Interview of the queens of France and Spain to prepare the extermination of the Calvinists—Death of the holy father.

WHEN the anger of the people of Rome was appeased, the cardinals entered into conclave to give a successor to the fierce Paul the Fourth. Before, however, electing the suffrages, they exacted, according to custom, a capitulation, which the new pontiff was to swear to; it contained these two articles:

"To recognise Ferdinand as emperor, in order to arrest the progress of the schism in Germany.

"To continue the council of Trent to advise on the measures to be taken for stifling the Reformation in France and the Low Countries."

Each member of the assembly having pledged himself to ratify, by oath, all that the capitulation contained, the rein was given to the intrigue, and the pretenders could, at their ease, knit and unknit their schemes according to their interests. The cardinal de Medicis, thanks to his immense fortune, carried it over his competitors, and was proclaimed pontiff by the name of Pius the Fourth.

There is no agreement as to the ancestors of the pope. Some historians affirm that he was of the illustrious family of the Medici of Florence; others maintain that his family occupied a very low rank in society; that his patrominic was Medequin, and his father's name Bernard. Be that as it may, this Bernard Medequin or Medicis, had married a young girl named Cecilia Serbellon, and had by her six sons and seven daughters. Pius the Fourth, who was the second of their children, had embraced the ecclesiastical state, and had raised himself gradually to the highest dignities of the church, and finally, to the throne of St. Peter.

In the interval which separated his nomination from his coronation, the pope showed clemency and pity. He published a general amnesty, in favour of those who had insulted the memory of Paul the Fourth, and to appease the murmurs of the Jesuits and monks, he offered to repair their colleges and convents at his own expense, and pledged himself to take an account of the losses they had sustained during the troubles; he appeared, in all his actions, to be humble, good natured, patient, and liberal to excess. But as soon as he was consecrated he was an entirely different man; greedy of gold and power, cruel, and debauched, he surpassed even his predecessor in perfidy and crimes.

Moreover, like Julius the Third, who had dishonoured the chair of the apostle before him, Pius the Fourth was very fond of good cheer and wine. The table was, say historians, the only thing for which this pontiff departed from his habits of sordid avarice; for with all his taste for licentiousness, adds the chronicle, he found means to possess the handsomest women, and most beautiful youth of Rome, without its costing him any thing. He was obliged to make them large presents, in order to attract them to the Vatican; but when he had enjoyed them, he put them to the torture, and forced them, by frightful punishments, to give up all they had received. As to his table, it was a different thing; no expense was spared; the rarest dishes, the most exquisite wines, were served up in ridiculous profusion, and the pope did the honours of his feasts so well, that he was carried dead drunk to his apartment every night.

His holiness had, moreover, the misfortune to have a very numerous family, which he wished to provide with benefices, abbeys, bishoprics, and cardinals' hats, which caused many remarks. But without troubling himself about them, he raised to the post of general of cavalry, his nephew, the count Frederick Borromeo, of the family of Serbellon, and confided to him the most important functions of the state. He gave the archbishopric of Milan to another of his nephews, named Charles Borromeo; he provided a third nephew with the government of the castle of San Angelo; he appointed Gabriel Serbellon, one of his cousins, captain of his guards; he raised to the bishopric of Spoleto the abbe Borromeo, another of his relatives, and, finally, he married to Count Frederick, Virginia, the eldest daughter of the duke of Urbin, and he married one of the sisters of the latter, to Don Cesar de Gonzagua. "We must," he said to the magistrates of Rome, who besought him to have a little reserve in the distribution of places to his family, "do to-day for my relatives all that is in my power, for to-morrow death may overtake me, and there will be no more time."

In accordance with this principle of not putting off until to-morrow what can be done to-day, his holiness was unwilling to leave with the Caraffa too much authority in Rome, and he determined to rid himself of them, before they rendered themselves too formidable. One day, when the cardinals of this family were assembled with their suite in the consistory, without suspecting that the pope, who owed his election to them, was plotting any thing against them, they found themselves suddenly surrounded by a band of archers, bound, gagged, and carried off to the prisons of the Vatican. At the same time, the palaces of John Caraffa, the count of Montorio, Leonard of Cardino, his brother-in-law, and the count d'Alise, were surrounded by soldiers, and their lords carried off by force, and confined in the castle of San Angelo. Pius the Fourth then commenced proceedings against this family, to compel them to restore the property and riches they had received from Paul the Fourth; then, as his purpose was to distribute their spoils among his relatives, he condemned them to death, giving, as a pretext for this terrible sentence, that he was determined to leave to the popes his successors, an example which might deter them from nepotism.

Charles Caraffa, after having been degraded from his titles and dignities, was strangled in prison; the count de Montorio, Leonard de Cardino, and the count d'Alise, were beheaded in the court yard of the castle, by the light of torches, and their dead bodies were cast into the Tiber. The young cardinal Alphonso of Caraffa, was alone spared, and purchased his liberty by paying to the pope the sum of a hundred thousand crowns, which he had, very fortunately, deposited out of the church, and on which Pius could not seize without his authority. Still this sacrifice only retarded for a time the death of Caraffa; for three months afterwards he was poisoned by a Jesuit at Naples. These bloody executions inspired such terror in the sacred college, that the cardinals could not sustain the look of Pius without growing pale, as the Roman senators formerly trembled before Tiberius. On his side, the holy father, who doubted the effects of this concentrated hatred, sought to place himself beyond the reach of the vengeance of the princes of the church, by placing himself under the protection of kings.

He first sent to Ferdinand bulls of investiture, and proclaimed him the lawful emperor of Germany, before he had taken any steps on this subject; which so surprised the prince that he feared a snare, and in this apprehension refused to receive the decree of the pope. But when he was assured, that it was a serious matter, he sent to thank the pope for his good intentions towards him, representing, however, that it would be very ridiculous for a pope to give an emperor authority to govern heretics. Pius was then occupied with a demand the king of France had made of him, in regard to the convocation of a national council, which he wished to hold in his kingdom, in order to arrest the progress of Calvinism, and to declare war on the city of Geneva, that hearth-stone of religious rebellions, where, for twenty-five years, were elaborated the great question of reformation and emancipation.

Calvin, who had adopted this city as his second country, had made it the metropolis of the reformed religion, and the centre of a very active trade in books, which were almost all hostile to the court of Rome; he had besides, made it one of the most remarkable cities of Europe for instruction in literature and science. Notwithstanding the multiplied occupations which the civil and political organization of this new republic necessarily gave to Calvin, he did not the less continue his religious preaching; he even gave three public lessons a week in theology; he assisted at all the meetings of the company of pastors, and carried on a correspondence with all the protestants in Europe, and particularly with those of the southern provinces of France.

The pope was still more urgent to carry on the war against Geneva, as, independently of the protection of Francis the Second, which his compliance had procured for him, he would annihilate the power of his dreaded foe. But the king of Spain, who feared lest the French should keep the sovereignty of that city after they had seized it, opposed the war, and saved Geneva.

Other events of equal importance soon attracted the attention of the pope and his cardinals, and showed them the necessity of lending each other mutual succour, if they did not wish to be overwhelmed by the torrent. In Scotland, the chiefs of the clans, and the doctors of the universities, after having held a meeting in Edinburg, had thrown off their obedience to the Holy See, and proclaimed the reformed worship the religion of the state. In Bohemia, King Maximilian had declared for Lutheranism; in Germany, the emperor Ferdinand openly protected the new religion; in France, the king and the lords, in an assembly held at Fontainebleau, had granted an edict of tolerance in favour of the reformed; in the Venetian countship, the Huguenots were triumphant, and this rich province, after two centuries of servitude, cast off the papal yoke; in Flanders, a powerful league, known as the league of the beggars, also pronounced in favour of the new religious opinions, and freed this province from the Holy See; finally, it appeared as if an invisible force were pushing the car of the papacy into the abyss, and that a new era was about to open for the people, notwithstanding the efforts of the numerous cohorts of Jesuits. Humanity was not, however, to be yet delivered from the popes; they had still a faithful ally among the kings, the cruel Philip the Second, the execrable offspring of Charles the Fifth, the executioner of his people, the exterminator of heretics; that tiger with a human face, who would have deserved to occupy the first place among the oppressors of the nations, if the sanguinary Charles the Ninth had never lived.

Philip was then the only sovereign in Europe who was not ranged on the side of the protestants; whether it was because he had an insatiable thirst for human blood, or whether it was because he entertained a secret hatred against the German electors, for having refused to recognise him as emperor, he declared an implacable war on the Lutherans of his kingdom. At Seville, Valladolid, and Madrid, in all the provinces of Spain and Italy submitted to his sway, he burned them by thousands; he then published an edict which condemned them to exile. Historians of the time relate that this tyrant placed himself at the gates of the cities, to see the reformed sally forth, and that at a signal his soldiers rushed upon them, and committed a frightful massacre. Thus at Cosenza, a city of the kingdom of Naples, three thousand Lutherans were murdered whilst crossing a vast plain to go to the mountains, in execution of the sovereign's decree.

His holiness, finding himself vigorously sustained by the king of Spain, determined to continue the council of Trent, and issued a bull appointing Easter day, in the year 1561, as the day for the opening of the sittings of the last session. Philip approved of the conduct of the pope, and commanded the prelates of his kingdom to obey the orders of the court of Rome. It was not the same in Germany; the emperor Ferdinand, who followed the advice of his son Maximilian and the principal electors, refused to receive the bull of convocation. He declared, in the name of the protestants, that Germany would never recognise the proceedings of an assembly which was a continuation of a synod that the Jesuits had constantly ruled. In France they showed no more haste to gratify the desires of Pius, at least at first, though Catherine de Medicis was mistress of the government, in consequence of the death of Francis the Second. The reason was a very natural one; this shrew, who had seized on the royal authority, as the tutress of Charles the Ninth, then ten years old, without the title of regent, was forced by circumstances to keep on good terms with the protestant lords. She pushed her hypocrisy so far as to address a letter to the pope, as king, for authority from him to introduce into France the use of the communion in two kinds, the abolition of images in the churches, the simplifications of the ceremonies of baptism, and the celebration of divine service in the vulgar tongue.

As Catherine expected, the holy father replied to the ambassador, that he would never give the people of France, a chalice filled with such dangerous poison; and on the observation of the deputy, that the queen would never have consented to take such a step, had she not been constrained and forced to do so by the Huguenots, he replied, that he would soon send her a plan of pacification, which would calm the fury of proselytism among the protestants. He then sent Jesuits to all the courts of Europe, commissioned to engage the Catholic princes to form a league for the extermination of the heretics. His holiness designated Charles the Ninth as the head of this sacrilegious league, and the duke of Guise as his lieutenant general; Spain was to furnish the funds necessary for the war, and the duke of Savoy was to contribute to the success of the enterprise, by furnishing a body of troops. The pontiff sought to assure the neutrality of the king of Navarre, by promising him Sardinia as a recompense; and Philip was to threaten him with an invasion by the allied forces, if he dared to unite his troops with those of the prince of Condé, the leader of the Huguenots.

His holiness also informed his allies, that he was on the eve of kindling a civil war between the Catholic and sacramentarian Swiss, so that the duke of Savoy might seize on Geneva without striking a blow, annihilate Calvinism, and then turn his arms against the Lutherans to exterminate them. But the execution of these plans required many troops, and as the princes of the league complained of the state of their finances, and the consequent impossibility of levying troops, Pius issued a bull, which authorised them to levy in the Catholic provinces, on one half of the revenues of the property of the clergy, to borrow on the property of the Calvinist nobility; confiscated to the profit of the inquisition; he, moreover, permitted priests and monks to take service in the armies of the league; he liberated them from the observance of their vows during the war, and granted to them plenary indulgences.

Immediately after the publication of this decree, the pontiff emptied the convents of his states, and formed an armed corps, composed in part of banditti and monks. These troops were sent into the Venaisin countship, under the leading of Fabricius Serbellon, in order to bring the subjects of his holiness to reason.

The soldiers of the pope, says Varillas, marked their passage through Provence by all kinds of depredations and cruelties; but what is the most singular, they spared the she goats, and formed immense flocks of them, which accompanied them in their march, and which they used in their debaucheries. The goat of the general had gilded horns; it was covered with garlands of flowers, and was led by silken cords. This band of wretches fell on the small city of Orange, laid siege to it, and carried it by assault. "Then were committed," adds the chronicler, "such frightful atrocities, as make the hair rise on the head at only reading them. The soldiers and monks forced the citizens to mount on the top of the houses, and to throw themselves down on pikes, halberds, and swords; they hung old men and children to the hooks in the chimnies, wasted them by a slow fire, cut off slices of the flesh and ate them before their victims were dead; they mutilated the men, and tore from them their organs of virility; they deflowered women, and young girls of extreme youth, and thrust into their bodies poles of enormous dimensions, which tore their bowels. Those who made any resistance were pitilessly murdered, and then exposed in the public places entirely naked, with ox horns thrust into the body. Finally, these satellites of pontifical tyranny, in their execrable fury, assuaged their lubricity on boys of scarcely ten years old, and when these unfortunates had been tortured by this horrid outrage, they fastened them to racks, and larded them while alive with pages of the bibles of Geneva, as you would do the flesh of pork or of birds."

So many cruelties exasperated the Huguenots; every where they rushed to arms. The civil war extended, and gained gradually all the southern provinces of France. It was precisely what his holiness desired; he thought the time had come to strike a great blow, and as the period fixed for the opening of the final session of the council of Trent was approaching, he hastened to send Laynez with his cohorts of Jesuits, to assist at the deliberations of the fathers; he named also four pontifical legates to preside over the sessions, each in his turn. The assembly was composed of two cardinals, three patriarchs, twenty-five archbishops, and one hundred and sixty-eight bishops or coadjutors, of seven croziered abbots, thirty-nine canons or vicars, charged to represent absent or sick prelates, and of seven generals of religious orders, all devoted or sold to the court of Rome.

According to the picturesque expression of the abbot of Lausac, the ambassador of France to the council, the fathers of Trent were constantly inspired by the Holy Spirit, which the pope sent daily with despatches in the valise of a courier. Every thing was decided, it is true, by a majority of voices, but we must observe, that most of the prelates were pensioners of the Holy See, and history has preserved us a list of forty of these infamous priests, who received sixty Roman crowns a month, to vote in conformity with the decisions of the holy father. This mob obeyed the least signal of the legate Simonetta, made a noise, stamped with their feet, drowned the voice of the speakers, and constantly interrupted the debates.

As we see, this constitutional system of tactics, which consists in the governors giving a little gold as a reward, to a troop of coward and felon mandataries, was already practised in the sixteenth century. Thus the result of the labours of the council of Trent was, that the bishops lost the little authority they had hitherto preserved; and on the conclusions of the Jesuit Laynez, it was decreed, that their dignity was a human institution, and that of the pope a divine one. All those priests who had sold their votes and their consciences, decided that the pope had an absolute and illimitable authority over ecclesiastics, as well as over the faithful, and that all owed to him absolute obedience and submission.

There was no question even as to the introduction of reforms into the church. The legates of the Holy See only declared, that in all that concerned heretics, the pope should be authorised to employ armed forces, tortures, or scaffolds to annihilate the Calvinists and Lutherans. The whole assembly pronounced anathemas and maledictions against the protestants, and terminated their session by a triple salvo of acclamations in honour of Pius the Fourth and the Catholic princes.

Disagreeable news troubled the joy of the pontiff, and interrupted the festivals which they were keeping at Rome for the successful issue of the council of Trent. It was the death of Ferdinand, and the election of his son Maximilian, as emperor of Germany. This prince sent ambassadors to the apostolic court, as a mere matter of form, to inform it of his election, but with a formal prohibition to take an oath of obedience to the pope, or to ask from him a confirmation of his title as king of the Romans and emperor of Germany.

Some cardinals endeavoured to obtain a mark of submission, by proposing to the deputies to take an oath of obedience in the name of Maximilian, as king of Hungary, which, according to them, they could not refuse to do, since it was incontestable that Ladislaus the First had received this kingdom as a fief from Gregory the Seventh. This concession having been refused, Pius the Fourth went further, so much had he it at heart to appear to be the dispenser of the imperial crown, and he sent to Germany letters of confirmation, which had not been asked for, and in which his holiness declared Maximilian to be the lawful emperor, by virtue of his all power, which supplied any irregularities which might have occurred in his election.

The policy of the pontiff was no more successful in France; Pius the Fourth, informed by the Jesuits that Catherine de Medicis thought of granting peace to the Huguenots, in order not to leave the Guises in command of the Catholic army, and to weaken that family, which had become yet more powerful since the assassination of the duke of Guise, endeavoured to change her resolution, and wrote a long letter of remonstrance to her on this subject. The queen paid no regard to it, and merely replied to the cardinal of Santa Croix, who brought her the despatches from the court of Rome, "Tell your master I have not made peace with the heretics, and that I am preparing for a terrible war with them, and that the day of vengeance will soon come."

This avowal advised the holy father that Catherine was meditating some great project for the extermination of the Huguenots, and he was the more rejoiced at it, as he supposed that nothing would oppose his excommunication of Jane d'Albret, queen of Navarre, the avowed enemy of the court of Rome. He consequently issued a bull against that princess, assigned to her to appear at Rome to be judged there, proclaiming her to be deprived of her throne in case of disobedience, and giving her estates to the first occupant, that is, to King Philip, who was only awaiting the time to enter Navarre. As the court of France had nothing more at heart than to prevent the family of Spain from establishing itself in these provinces, Catherine found herself compelled to disapprove of the conduct of the pope, and to send a plenipotentiary to Rome, to represent to the sacred college that Jane d'Albret must be regarded as the sovereign of Bearn, and the lawful possessor of the lordships of Albret, Foix, Armagnac, Comines, and Bigone; that she had been recognised as queen by all the princes of Christendom, and, consequently, that none but God could take them from her, and that she could not be in any way brought within the jurisdiction of the Holy See; moreover, that her kingdom being a fief of the crown of France, Charles the Ninth was too much interested in the matter to suffer his provinces to be given to the first occupant, and that the king must assist with his arms, his ally, his vassal, and his near relative, the widow, and the mother of the two first princes of his blood; finally, if the holy father was unwilling to revoke the proceedings commenced against the king of Navarre, he must not think illy of it, if France interfered in the matter, and used the extreme measures which had heretofore been successful, when the Holy See wished to usurp too much authority over the monarchy.

Pius the Fourth, who dreaded an invasion of the French into Italy, promised to stop all proceedings against the queen of Navarre, which he did ostensibly, though he pursued her no less actively than before in the shade of his audacious efforts. At his instigation, the Jesuits secretly spread themselves through the dominions of this princess, and led her Catholic subjects into a conspiracy, whose object was to seize Jane and her children, and hand her over to the tribunals of the inquisition of Spain, to be condemned as a heretic. This infernal machination was fortunately foiled by the Huguenots, who were informed of it and who took precautions to avert it.

Though once more unmasked, the pope did not abandon his plan of exterminating the reformed, but before taking other steps with the court of France to bring it into a new league, he wished to close the sessions of the council of Trent, and issued, through his creatures, bulls as ridiculous as impious, which this assembly of simoniacal priests declared to be obligatory on all kingdoms. His holiness did not, however, obtain from this measure the success he desired. In Germany they refused to submit to the decrees of the cabal of Trent, and Maximilian the Second placed himself at the head of the opposition.

In France, notwithstanding the efforts of the Jesuits, the acts of this assembly were rejected; the chancellor de l'Hopital demonstrated that the court could not sacrifice the liberties of the Gallic church to the ambition of the pope, without deserving the blame of men, and the accusation of ignorance and cowardice; unfortunately he did not show the same independence in the proceedings which took place shortly after, between the university and the Jesuits. The following was the occasion; these fathers had purchased secretly, from the rector Julian de St. Germain, scholastic letters, that is, authority to keep school with all the privileges of the university. During the temporary magistracy of Julian, they had taught publicly without being disturbed; but after the retirement of their protector, the members of the university assembled in council, and cited before them the Jesuits who had opened a college in the capital. They presented themselves resolutely on the day fixed in the citation, and replied thus to the questions of the new rector. "Are you regular monks? No, for our society is not a religious one, and we are not perfect enough to possess a vocation so holy. Are you secular priests? No, since we live in congregations under certain laws approved by the pope. What are you then? We are Jesuits."

As no other reply could be drawn from these reverends, the university refused to admit them into its bosom, erased the scholastic letters which had been purchased from Julian of St. Germain, and the affair was then brought before the parliament. Peter Versoris defended the Jesuits, and the advocate Stephen Pasquier spoke in the name of the university. On the pleadings of this latter, the attorney general concluded on the expulsion of the Jesuits, sustaining his decision chiefly on the fact, that these fathers, having taken an oath of obedience to a foreign general, were unfit to be entrusted with the education of French youth. The pope immediately interfered; he wrote to French cardinals, the bishop of Paris, the king and queen; he besought them all to sustain the Jesuits, who were, according to him, courageous soldiers, destined especially to combat the heretics. His legates seconded him so well, that most of the judges were gained, even the first president Christopher de Thou, the brother of the historian. Still the parliament dared not allow them to gain their cause, and only permitted them to employ the heritage of the bishop of Clermont, William Duprat, in the foundation of a college.

The triumph which the fathers had obtained over the university rejoiced the pope the more, as this first success prepared the way for the future execution of an infernal plan, of which he and Catherine de Medicis were alone in the secret, and in which the execrable Charles the Ninth was afterwards associated.

At the same time died Calvin, worn out by study and labour; this intrepid athlète, this implacable adversary of the papacy, died as he had lived, combatting for the intellectual emancipation of the human race. Calvin would unquestionably have occupied the first place among the apostles of the Reformation, if the punishment of Michael Servetus did not show us, that with him the vanity of the writer triumphed over the convictions of the reformer. For disinterestedness, few men have shown a self-denial equal to his; for during his whole life, his annual income did not exceed an hundred and fifty livres in money, twenty-seven bushels of grain, and two tons of wine, and he would never receive more. At his death, when the magistrates took an inventory of his property in books, furniture, dishes, and plates, and money, they found it amounted to the small sum of only one hundred and twenty-five crowns.

Whilst his holiness was rejoicing over his deliverance from so terrible a foe, and dreaming of the mode of taking some advantage from this fortunate event, a plot was then organised against his life; so true is it, that we are never so near danger, as when we think ourselves farthest from it. Peter Accolti, a rich citizen of Rome, had formed a secret society with some of his friends, who were, like him, indignant at seeing their country submitted to the despotism of Pius the Fourth. The conspiracy being organised, Accolti made several efforts, and under various pretexts, to introduce himself into the pontifical palace, to stab the execrable pontiff. But unfortunately one evening his holiness was apprised that he persisted strongly in obtaining an audience.

This awakened the suspicions of the pope; immediately, and by his order, the house of Accolti was surrounded, the doors forced, and the rooms examined; as it was the time when the conspirators met, all his accomplices were seized, bound, and plunged into the dungeons of the inquisition. After having suffered there dreadful tortures, they were burned alive on the great square of Rome, for the edification of the faithful.

Although the plot of Accolti had been ward off, it was the cause of two great sources of grief to the pontiff; one of his nephews, Frederick Borromeo, became seriously ill. in consequence of the fatigue he had undergone in instituting proceedings against the accused, and died; another of his nephews, the cardinal Charles Borromeo, whom the church has since canonized, after having exhibited an incredible bitterness against the unfortunate conspirators, became horror-stricken at himself, abandoned the court, and retired to Milan, of which he was the archbishop.

Deprived of his dearest nephews, Pius bestowed all his affections on the sons of his sister, Hannibal and Mark Alteams; he gave to the first the government of Rome, and destined the widow of Frederick Borromeo, with a large dowry, for him in marriage. He abandoned to the second, who was already a cardinal, by the title of Sitico, the direction of religious matters, and as he foresaw that he would not have the power long in his hands on account of the advanced age of his uncle, and his habitual debaucheries, he resolved to profit by the time. He first burthened the people with extraordinary imposts, and laid forced contributions on the nobility and clergy; he publicly sold dispensations and canons; he then borrowed large sums, under the pretext of levying troops, and seized on the sums destined for the equipment of the recruits.

Pius the Fourth, freed from all care and inquietude, reposed from the agitations of his past life, regaling his sight by day with the punishments in the halls of torture of the inquisition, and by night plunging into drunken debauches with his favourites, minions, and mistresses. He was at last drawn from his apathy by the ambassadors of Spain, who, to recall him to a sentiment of his political existence, summoned him to renew his efforts against Germany, and to have the proceedings of the synod of Trent adopted in that country. He then sent nuncios to the court of Bavaria, and to that of Maximilian, to engage the sovereigns of those countries to take steps in conformity with the decisions of the fathers. The duke of Bavaria, Albert the Third, called the Magnanimous, who had been for a long time under the influence of the Jesuits, made no difficulty in receiving the decrees of the pretended oecumenical council, and even declared to the apostolic ambassadors that he intended to massacre three-fourths of his subjects, to constrain them to obey the pope, and reconfirm the bosom of Catholicism. He commanded and compelling the professors of In-god cardinal sign the creed, under penalty of banishment, and then forced the public functionaries to adhere to the Catholic confession under penalty of degradation. With the citizens, he used still less caution; he gave them up to the jurisdiction of the Jesuits. It was not so in the states immediately dependent on Maximilian; not only did he refuse to listen to the remonstrances of the pope, but he informed him, in the name of the electors, that he must authorise in Germany, the communion under two kinds, and the marriage of the priests, unless he wished to perpetuate the schism and expose himself to great dangers.

Pius, notwithstanding his desire to avoid a rupture with Maximilian, dared not accede unreservedly to his demand, and replied to him, that his position as infallible pontiff, permitted him to modify the worship at his pleasure; that he would consequently authorise the communion under two kinds, but that it was impossible for him to decide the question of the marriage of priests.

The prince not appearing satisfied with this concession, his holiness took steps to allay the danger; he sought to attract to his cause the kings of France and Spain, and persuaded these two sovereigns that Maximilian had a well-arranged plan of uniting with the Huguenots of France to annihilate Catholicism and seize on the thrones of Charles the Ninth and Philip the Second. The fear of danger, all powerful over the mind of tyrants, determined the kings of France and Spain to league with the pope. Philip sent his wife to Bayonne, and Charles the Ninth accompanied his mother to the conference, to arrange with the duke of Alba and the representatives of his holiness, the basis of a new league against the protestants. It was agreed in this cabal of wild beasts and hyenas, that Catherine de Medicis should lay a strong hand on all the Huguenots of France, whilst the Spanish armies should invade Navarre and the Low Countries, to close with the heretics at a blow.

As it was necessary for the success of such a plan to lull the vigilance of the Calvinists, the holy father suspended the proceedings of the tribunals of the inquisition against those who were accused of heresy; he set a great number of those unfortunate persons at liberty, and to increase still further the security of the protestants he invited, every night, to his table the ambassadors of Germany and Huguenot lords, and got drunk in drinking to their conversion. This ardent desire of Pius to see religion triumph over the heretics, carried him so far in his libations, that at the close of a great repast, during which he swallowed twelve flasks of wine, he was taken with an attack of apoplexy and died in a few hours afterwards, on the night of the 8th or 9th of December, 1565.

PIUS THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1565.]

Election of Pius the Fifth—His history before his promotion to the papacy—His holiness presides over the tribunal of the inquisition—Cruelties of the holy father—His laws against the prostitutes of Rome—Diet of Augsburg—The pontiff induces the king of Spain to massacre his subjects in the Low Countries—He kindles the civil war in France—The victory of the duke of Alba attributed to the prayers of the pope—Quarrel between the pope and the emperor—Conspiracy of the holy father against Elizabeth of England—He anathematizes that queen—League against the Turks—Negotiation of the cardinal Alexandrin—The pope seeks the alliance of the Arabs and Persians—He wishes to exterminate the protestants of Europe—Death of this execrable pope.

WHEN the funeral ceremonies of the infamous Pius the Fourth were over, the cardinals entered into the conclave, and according to custom, each went to work to intrigue, either to buy or sell his vote. Charles Borromeo, the nephew of the dead pontiff, being one of the richest, was in a situation to decide the election by pronouncing, with his faction, for the candidate who was agreeable to him. The cardinal Morone, a venerable prelate, who possessed a justly acquired reputation for tolerance and morality, was first proposed; it was for his very virtues that Charles caused him to be excluded. He represented to the members of the sacred college that such a pope would not know how to use a salutary rigor in maintaining the rights of the Holy See; they yielded to his remarks. The cardinal Sireletto was then proposed; this cardinal was rejected on account of the severity of his morals and his habits of sobriety. They then spoke of the grand inquisitor, Michael Ghisleri, a debauched and ferocious Dominican. Charles Borromeo finding nothing to say against this choice, he was immediately proclaimed head of the church by the name of Pius the Fifth.

It has been proved that the origin of this pontiff was most obscure, though his courtiers afterwards sought to forge a genealogy for him, which made him a descendent of the illustrious family of the Consilieri, a name which his ancestors had abandoned, they said, when they established themselves at Rome, to take that of Ghisleri. Vanity has so much power over the hearts of men that his holiness, whether he was the dupe of this absurd story, or whether he wished to conceal from the eyes of men the low rank of his relatives, issued a brief, ordering the Ghisleri to retake the glorious name of Consilieri.

Michael was born at Bologna, of parents so poor and miserable that he was constrained to enter as a scullion into a convent of the order of St Dominic. His good figure, and certain attractions of manner, had attracted the attention of the prior, one of the most debauched monks of the convent; he made him his minion, and to cover his infamous amours from the eyes of his brethren, he took care of his education. At sixteen years of age Michael had become so skilful a theologian, that he was appointed a professor of his order; afterwards, and still by the assistance of the prior, he was appointed an inquisitor in the city of Como. The young Dominican merited the distinctions with which he was honoured, and commenced displaying that inflexible character and implacable cruelty, which were to make him one of the most sanguinary pontiffs that ever occupied the seat of the apostle. We must not be astonished then that his severities towards the unfortunate heretics, drove him in succession from Como, Bergamo, and the country of the Grisons, whither he had been sent to persecute the heretics, in the capacity of commissioner general of the inquisition. After having discharged the duties of inspector general of the tribunals of the holy office for several years, he was made grand inquisitor during the pontificate of Paul the Fourth. His cruelties, in the exercise of his new office, were pushed so far, that a cry of execration against him went up from all directions.

Scarcely was he installed on the chair of St. Peter, when he erased the proceedings ordained by his predecessor against the family of the Caraffa, and gave a prelude, by judicial executions, to the butcheries which filled his reign. All those who had contributed directly, or indirectly, to the condemnation of the nephews of Paul the Fourth, his protector, were arrested, plunged into the dungeons of the inquisition and burned alive. The judges alone were spared, on account of their servile retraction, for these wretches had the meanness to go in a body to the Vatican, to humble themselves before him, and to beseech him to absolve them from their crime, and to pardon them for having shed innocent blood to please an infallible pontiff. None of the enemies of this family could escape the vengeance of Pius the Fifth; he pursued them even into foreign countries, where they had taken refuge. Julius Zoanetti was arrested at Venice, and Peter Carnesecchi was carried off from Florence; they were both brought to Rome, and brought to judgment for having been guilty of criminal intercourse with the beautiful Victoria Colonna, the widow of Pescara, and of Julia of Gonzagua, who were both suspected of heresy; an absurd accusation, since one of these women had been dead for nineteen years. Carnesecchi and Zoanetti were, however, put to the torture in the presence of the holy father, and pinched with red hot pincers, with such cruelty that these unfortunate men avowed their guilt, and asked, as a favour, to be condemned to death, which was at once granted them.

His holiness, though freed from the enemies of the Caraffa, gave no relaxation to the executioners of the holy office; he fell upon the heretics, cast them, by thousands, into prison, and even wished to preside over the executions. Among other examples of the ferocity of Pius, the historian Volatteran, cites the case of a young woman, who had been denounced by the spies of the inquisitors, for having aided the flight, from Rome, of one of her sisters, who had embraced Calvinism. This unfortunate female was torn, by night, from her family, and without any regard to her state of pregnancy, was plunged into a dark and infected cell, where she was delivered of her child from fright. In the morning the cruel Pius brought her before his tribunal, and without being moved by the protestations of innocence, and the prayers of this unfortunate woman, he ordered the monks, who filled the office of tormentors, to do their duty. Three Dominicans then seized her, tore off her clothes, and left her entirely naked; they then bent her body on the rack, fastened her feet and arms to cords which were retained to the wall in iron rings, and drew her with so much violence, that her delicate and weak members were cut to the bone. They then inflicted on her the torture of water. But after she had swallowed eight whole measures, she vomited it up with torrents of blood, and fainted. His holiness then ordered the executioners to apply plates of heated brass to the most sensitive parts of her body, and to light a fire under her feet, which recalled her from her swoon. Finally, as she persisted in her innocence, they took her down from the rack, and carried her back to her dungeon to her child, who had died from cold, whilst they were torturing her; she herself died the next day. Pius having discovered that she had been falsely accused, contented himself with restoring her dead body to her family.

Aonius Palearius, one of the most celebrated authors of the sixteenth century, became also the victim of this monster on the following account. A spy of the inquisition having informed the court of Rome, that Aonius had said that the inquisition was a dagger, whose blade was directed at the heart of all men of letters, the pope sent sbirri to Milan, seized the guilty man by night, and conducted him to Rome, where he was at once thrown into the prisons of the Vatican. He was then put to the torture, and compelled to sign a writing, in which he admitted that the pope had the power to put heretics to death; that the church could appoint ministers to carry out the sentences inflicted by the inquisitors; that the Roman pontiff himself night, with his own hand, after the example of Samuel and St. Peter, seize the sword and strike his enemies. When the unfortunate man had placed his name to this, they used his own avowals against him, and Pius caused him to be hung before his eyes.

The acts of barbarity which signalised the commencement of this pontificate, produced such alarm, that in less than six months more than a third of the population had abandoned the holy city; and as the cardinals essayed one day in the consistory, to make some remonstrances with Pius, to induce him, for the interest of the church, to show clemency: "No, no," he replied, "we are inexorable; no pity, no mercy for heretics; better to annihilate the present generation, than bequeath error to those which are to come."

In fact, instead of departing from his severity, he became more terrible, and more implacable than ever; and on the mere suspicion that several Calvinist females had enrolled themselves among the prostitutes, to avoid being handed over to the inquisitors, he published an edict enjoining on the courtezans of Rome to marry in less than a month, or to leave the city, under penalty, in case of disobedience, of being publicly whipped by the executioner. This decree was not, however, executed, and the cardinals induced him to revoke it, by representing to him that the forty-five thousand prostitutes who inhabited Rome were necessary for the ecclesiastics, and that if he suppressed the brothels, his clergy would fall into the shameful disorders of sodomy, and that he would, moreover, deprive the apostolic treasury of the most productive source of its revenues. This last consideration determined Pius to substitute for afflictive penalties a simple mark of infamy; he decided that these women should in future dwell in one quarter, and that they should not appear by day or night in the streets of Rome. He preserved to them, however, the privilege of being buried in a consecrated ground, situated near the Flaminian gate, behind the leaning wall called muro torto. The holy father also evinced severity towards torredores; he prohibited, under penalty of excommunication, those who died in bull fights from being buried in holy ground. Finally, he urged his cruelty so far, as to enjoin on physicians to quit attending the sick who refused to receive the sacraments at the third visit, and to denounce them to superior authority.

Pius the Fifth limited himself to no bounds, that he might make Italy groan beneath the yoke of fanaticism and terror. Already master of Spain, in which reigned Philip the Second, his worthy rival in ferocity, he wished to assure the triumph of the inquisition in the Low Countries, and excited the king of Spain to pursue the heretics of those countries to the utmost. Margaret of Parma, the sister of Philip, and regent of the Low Countries, did her best to second the fury of her brother, and caused many of the reformed to be arrested. But whether the judges tacitly favoured the new doctrines, or whether they discovered the danger of pushing a warlike people to despair, almost all the accused were set at liberty. In the principal cities of the province, at Tournay, Lille, Valenciennes, the followers of Baius, and of John of Lovain, who were moderate Calvinists, were counted by thousands. Assemblies of five or six hundred persons, protected by the prince of Orange, met ostensibly to sing the psalms of the celebrated Clement Marot, the poet of the French court, and if Margaret of Parma desired to restrain the heretics; or to close the halls which they used for their temples, the people ran to arms and drove away the soldiers.

Philip the Second, at the instigation of the holy father, issued new edicts against the heretics, and ordered the princes and lords of the Low Countries, to have the decrees of the council of Trent adopted in the fiefs dependent on their jurisdiction, under penalty of being deprived of their property and dignities. Instead of being intimidated by this threat, the Flemings determined to rid themselves of Spanish tyranny, and swore to perish to the last man in regaining their independence. A vast conspiracy was formed, under the direction of Philip Maruix, of Sainte Aldegonda, and on the appointed day, more than thirty thousand peasants, burghers, or nobles, assembled in a vast plain without the gates of Brussels, and made several important decisions. At the close of this first meeting, five hundred deputies, having at their head Henry de Brederode, the counts of Nassau, Berg and Culemburg, traversed the city in silence, went to the palace of the regent, and demanded, in the name of the people, to present a request to her.

Margaret, alarmed by such an imposing manifestation, received the envoys with every appearance of kindness, and promised them to suppress the tribunals of the inquisition, and grant them freedom of conscience. But, as they were retiring, the count de Barlemont, her intimate confidant and lover, exclaimed with the insolence of a favourite: "Take courage dutchess, you have only to deal with a crowd of beggars, whom it will be easy to bring to reason." On the next day Brederode seized the word, and proposed to the conspirators, to name their association the confederacy of beggars. The rebels then fastened to their girdles a wooden porringer, and around their neck a medal, representing on one side King Philip, and on the other a wallet, with this motto, "Faithful to the king to beggary." On their side, the Catholics adopted a medal, representing the Holy Virgin with her son in her arms.

Pius the Fifth, informed by Margaret of Parma of this badge, had a ship's cargo of medals made at Rome, which he sent at once to her, with a brief, which granted plenary indulgences to those who wore them, for all the crimes they had committed or might in future commit. His holiness wrote at the same time to the governess, to praise her for the zeal she had exhibited, and to exhort her to be pitiless in the exercise of her power. The conspirators of Flanders, however, tired of waiting uselessly for the execution of the promises of the sister of Philip, resolved to summon that sovereign to decide the matter, and sent a deputation to him in Spain. The pontiff, informed of this step, sent at once a mandate to Peter Camajan, bishop of Ascoli, his nuncio at Madrid, to watch the deputies of Flanders, and to set every thing to work to induce the king to burn them alive as heretics. The money of the holy father found no difficulty in inducing the sanguinary Philip to adopt a measure in accordance with his morals and his habits; and on the day of the arrival of the deputation of the beggars, the unfortunate Flemings who composed it were arrested, handed over to the tribunals of the holy office, and put to death.

As soon as the news of this atrocious action reached the Low Countries, a general cry of indignation arose against the infamous monarch. Fifty thousand insurgents rose as one man, traversed the boroughs, villages, cities, carrying fire and blood every where, breaking the statues of the saints, pillaging the churches and monasteries, murdering the priests and monks. "In the city of Antwerp," say the Catholic historians, "deplorable scenes occurred; the cathedral was pillaged for three days, and the beggars, not content with destroying the images, used, in derision, the holy oil to smooth their hair and beards. We cannot too much applaud the preaching of the Franciscan, Corneille Adriaensen, and repeat with him 'yes, we must hang, burn, waste, boil, flay, strangle, bury alive, those infamous heretics; we must rip up the stomachs of their women, and crush their infants against the walls, in order to annihilate for ever their execrable race.'" We will add what the Catholic writers have passed by in silence, that the better to kindle the pious ardour of the bigots and fanatics who followed the sermons of Adriaensen, that preacher assembled the youngest and handsomest of both sexes, stripped them of their clothing and whipped them mildly and gently with osier twigs.

Notwithstanding the efforts of the regent, the revolt of the beggars soon became so threatening, that Margaret was compelled to grant liberty of conscience, and suppress the tribunals of the inquisition. From that time, the reformed preached their doctrines freely through all Flanders, and bands of eight or ten thousand religionists left the cities of Tournay, Lille, Valenciennes, and Antwerp, to listen to the preaching of the ministers Hessels and Baius in the open country.

Pius the Fifth, furious at this concession, wrote to Margaret, that she must revoke the edict she had made in favour of the beggars, under penalty of the most terrible censures, and ordered her to march her best troops at once against the rebels. He also wrote to Philip the Second, that he relaxed nothing in his rigour against the heretics of Flanders, and that he would refuse his sanction to the measures of his sister.—"We must make all these wretches swim in a sea of blood," added he, in his letter to the prince; "fire and sword must transform those fertile plains and proud cities into deserts, that the faithful may applaud our orthodox zeal, and rejoice in the triumph of the faith." The king of Spain, as usual, obeyed the pope, and sent the duke of Alba into Flanders, at the head of a powerful army, to take the government of that province, and fortified with orders so severe, that the apostolic nuncio wrote to Pius the Fifth, that that sovereign had so much love for religion, that it was necessary to arrest him, rather than to urge him on.

As soon as the duke entered Brussels, the regent placed all her powers in his hands, and left the Low Countries. He, finding himself invested with unlimited authority, wished to exercise it with the rigour which had been commanded him. He immediately created a chamber of justice, which he called the council of troubles, but which the people called the council of blood. He then arrested thousands of citizens, without distinction, and filled the prisons with them; he then proscribed all the nobles, confiscated their property, sold it for the use of the prince, and employed the proceeds in building bastilles, forts, and citadels around the cities, and, finally, when he thought himself beyond the reach of new efforts at insurrection, he proceeded to the execution of the prisoners.

John Vargas, one of the favourites of the new governor, was appointed president of the tribunal of blood, which condemned all the accused without exception, and without regard for sex or religion, since, wrote Philip, all the Belgians deserved death; the heretics for having pillaged the churches, and the Catholics for not having prevented them from doing so. During whole months, gibbets, scaffolds, and funeral pyres covered the public squares of all the principal cities, and each day brought around for the Belgians new executions, or new punishments.

It was computed that in a single day, between the rising and the setting of the sun, the duke of Alba, burned, flayed, and roasted more than six hundred persons. The alarm was every where at its height; the prince of Orange, a great number of lords, and more than thirty thousand Calvinists fled, fortunately, into England, France, and Germany, and escaped death; but those who had not time nor the wish to emigrate, amongst others the counts of Horn and Egmont, and twenty-three of the most illustrious lords of the nobility of Flanders, were arrested and mercilessly executed.

At last, as the representative of Philip continued his murders and massacres, the emigrant Calvinists determined to free their country from the monster who oppressed it. Seconded by Queen Elizabeth of England, who hated Pius the Fifth, aided by the Huguenots of France, they assembled in arms under the command of the prince of Orange and count Louis of Nassau, his brother, and marched on Brussels. Unfortunately, the duke of Alba at the head of his veteran and numerous troops, conquered these intrepid chiefs, and forced them to fall back on France. This victory was attributed, by the Catholics, to the prayers of the pope; Te Deums were chanted in all the churches of Italy, to return thanks to God for the defeat of the heretics; at Rome they illuminated; his holiness even caused cannon to be fired, to celebrate the triumph of the Catholics, and in the effusion of his joy, he sent to the executioner of Flanders a sword and a cap of honour, with this address, "To the glorious conqueror of heresy." The duke of Alba was so pleased with this title, that he had it engraved on the pedestal of a statue which was erected to him at Antwerp.

Flanders subjugated and the heretics crushed, the pope turned his attention to Scotland, where the new doctrines had been proclaimed by parliament the religion of the state. He thought it would be easy for him to bring back the people of this country beneath the pontifical yoke, by flattering the irregular passions of their queen, the beautiful Mary Stuart, the widow of Francis the Second, and again married to a Scotch gentleman named Darnley. He accordingly proposed to give her as much money as she wanted, provided she would erase the decree of her parliament, and would put to death her natural brother, the earl of Murray, a lord named Morton, and her own husband, who had all three been imprudent enough to declare openly against the court of Rome. The queen entered into this bargain the more willingly, as her new spouse was disfigured by the smallpox; and as his beauty alone had procured him the throne, it was natural his homeliness should lose it for him. Mary Stuart then organised an infernal plot with Bothwell, her new favourite, who had succeeded the Italian Rizzio, assassinated in her sight by Darnley. She herself conducted her convalescent husband to a house which belonged to the provost of the college of St. Mary, under a pretence of a change of air, and on the same night she left him, to assist at the marriage of one of her maids of honour, leaving no one with him but a valet de chambre. What occurred during that night? No one knows; only that towards two o'clock in the morning, an explosion was heard, the house of the provost fell down from the explosion of a mine, and when the bodies of the king and his domestic were found, both bore marks of strangulation. Some months afterwards the court of Rome sent three hundred thousand crowns of gold to pay for the festivities of the third marriage of the queen of Scotland with her favourite Bothwell; and a nuncio went towards Scotland with a legion of Jesuits and Dominicans, to organise inquisitorial tribunals. But the Scotch did not permit the two assassins to fulfil the conditions of their infamous treaty; they took up arms every where; a formidable insurrection broke out at all points at once, and an army besieged Mary and her accomplice in the castle of Bothwick. At the very moment they were about to be forced in this retreat, they received succour from without and facilitated their flight. Mary threw herself into the fortress of Dunbar; Bothwell escaped to the Orkneys, and went to Norway, where he died miserably.

When the nuncio was informed of these events he was at Ansero and preparing to embark for Scotland; fear of danger caused him promptly to renounce his mission; he hastened to retrace his steps, with his horde of inquisitors, and returned to Italy. Pius the Fifth, furious at having spent so much money only to murder a king, when he desired the extermination of a people, would no longer hear of Mary Stuart, and abandoned her to her unfortunate fate.

His holiness had however found in France a compensation for this check; the general of the Jesuits, Laynez, had been dead for two years, and his successor Borgia, duke of Candia, one of the descendents of the infamous pope, Alexander the Sixth, had marvellously restored the situation of affairs in that country.

In order to obtain an idea of the folly, fanaticism, and ignorance of this new chief of the Jesuits, it is only required to read the strange discourse he delivered on the day of his election. Among other things he said, "The favour I beseech you to grant me, most reverend fathers, who have made me your chief, is to use me as muleteers use their beasts of burthen: they are not content with placing on their backs the load they are to bear, they still direct them. If they stumble, they solace them; if they go not fast enough they whip them; if they fall down they raise them. I wish to be truly your beast of burthen; use me then as these animals are used, that I may be enabled to say, 'I look upon myself as an ass in your company.' Raise up, then, your beast by your prayers; if it goes too slowly, excite it by your charitable advice; finally, if you see me bend beneath the burthen of my charge, remove the weight of my panniers." Pius the Fifth soon discovered what advantage he might derive from such a general; thus he spurred him on unceasingly to give a more active impulse to the society; and soon, thanks to his efforts, the disciples of Loyola spread themselves through all the provinces of France, organised brotherhoods of penitents, congregations of devotees, into which princes, lords, barons, and burghers entered, all pledged, in the name of the Holy Trinity, to live and die for the defence of the Catholic faith; all sworn on the consecrated host, to sacrifice their property and their lives to protect it, to extend and avenge the Roman religion; finally, all swearing, between the hands of the chief of these partial associations, to obey blindly the orders which were transmitted to them in the name of the pope. Whoever refused to enter one of these fraternities, was declared an enemy of God, and as such the Jesuits designated him for the daggers of fanatics.

As soon as these religious societies had taken a certain development, the holy father resolved to use them to form a vast league which should embrace all France: he then informed Charles the Ninth, through the cardinal Lorraine, that he was unwilling to endure much longer that the Calvinists should outrage God by praying in their houses; that he consequently recalled the solemn engagements which he had entered into with the glorious duke of Alba at the interview of Bayonne, and the promise his mother had made in his name to exterminate all the protestants of his kingdom. The king replied that he entered fully into the views of the court of Rome, and that he was as anxious as his holiness to put an end to the Reformation, and that he only waited for a favourable moment to strike a great blow. But things transpired otherwise than as he hoped. Instead of waiting for the Catholics to attack them, the Huguenots, whose distrust had been excited by the armaments of the court, became the assailants, assembled under the orders of the prince of Condé and commenced hostilities. In fifteen days they carried fifty places, pushed their success as far as Monceaux, where the court was, and evinced a disposition to carry off the young monarch. A panic seized the courtiers, and they all fled with the cowardly Charles the Ninth, and cast themselves into Meaux, from whence they reached Paris, under the protection of six thousand Swiss and the light horse of the guard. As soon as the bulk of his army arrived, they commenced the blockade of Paris, to starve it; for this purpose he burned the mills, made himself master of the Seine, and placed garrisons in the neighbouring chateaux to intercept the convoys of provisions which were arriving by land. This measure produced the result the reformed expected; the people, brought to bay, murmured and threatened to open the gates of the city to the prince. In this extremity the king determined to make a sortie in person to repulse the Huguenots and free his capital; he still however remained prudently with the rear guard, so as not to expose his person, and gave the command of the troops to the constable, Anne de Montmorency. The action was fought with equal fury on both sides; but the constable having been mortally wounded, the day was decided in favour of the Calvinists, Charles fled at full speed to Paris, and the Catholic soldiers, following his example, abandoned the field of battle.

The prince of Condé, without loss of time, moved his camp nearer, and enclosed the place so that it was no longer possible to afford it any succour. Catherine de Medicis then demanded a conference with the besiegers; she offered to grant them the free exercise of the reformed religion throughout the kingdom; she engaged to pay the arrears due to the German troops, and employed threats and promises so well, that she induced the Huguenot leaders to sign a peace. This treaty, imposed on them by circumstances, did not satisfy either the court, or Catherine de Medicis, or Pius the Fifth, who saw his plans of extermination annihilated; thus the Catholics made no scruple at not observing its clauses, and the Jesuits continued as before, to make the chairs in the schools and the pulpits in the churches, resound with furious declamations against the heretics. Catherine de Medicis and Charles the Ninth, excited assaults upon the reformed and encouraged assassinations, so that in less than three months, more than ten thousand of the reformed fell victims to these hateful manœuvres.

Urged on by despair, the latter retook their arms, equipped a fleet, and sent to ask for aid from the queen of England and the princes of Germany. On his side, the pope spared no pains to render the war between the Catholics and protestants most bloody. He sent large sums to Catherine de Medicis, to assist her in levying troops, and also a body of Italian cavalry, to reinforce her army. Some generous citizens, among others the chancellor de l'Hospital, represented to the king, that he was obeying, without knowing it, the suggestions of the court of Rome; that it was impolitic for a sovereign to exterminate his subjects for the interests of the pope, and that the safety of his kingdom demanded toleration. But this beardless monarch, this fanatical devotee, was unwilling to listen to any advice; he drove these virtuous men from his presence, took the seals from the chancellor, and exiled him from the court.

Freed from the inconvenient supervision which the chancellor de l'Hospital exercised over them, the Jesuits gave a new impulse to the religious associations which they had organised in all parts of the kingdom. Catherine de Medicis entered into an arrangement with them, so as to give more unity to her plans, and sent, through them, to the heads of the fraternities, the form of an oath, by which each of them bound himself to obey no orders but those of the king, and to abstain from any enterprise which had not his formal sanction. She then issued a decree prohibiting the Huguenots from assembling for worship, under penalty of death.

Charles the Ninth, still at the instigation of his mother, issued a second edict, which enjoined on the reformed to abstain from their employments; and the parliament of Paris, in verifying this decree, had the cowardice to add, that from henceforth no one should be admitted to the magistracy, who did not first swear to live and die in the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman faith. These obligations were even imposed on the university, and by order of his majesty, the doctors of the four faculties were held to swear absolute obedience to the wishes of the pope, with their right hand on the gospel and their left on a crucifix.

When the royal army was in a situation to keep the field, the marshal Saulx de Tavannes took the command of it, though the title of generalissimo had been given to the duke of Anjou, the king's brother, a young debauchee of sixteen. The Catholic army first endeavoured to seize the prince of Condé and the admiral Coligny; but these two leaders, warned in time, escaped from the troops which had been sent against them and took refuge in Rochelle, the bulwark of the Calvinists, where they found the succours which had been sent to them from Germany and England.

The Huguenots then took the offensive, and though inferior in number to the Catholics, they thrice offered them battle. Unfortunately, numbers prevailed over courage, and in these two days the reformed met with terrible losses. At Jarnac, Louis of Bourbon, prince of Condé, was slain with ten thousand of his co-religionists. At Moncontour, more than twenty thousand protestants remained upon the field. On this last day, the Catholics showed so much cruelty, say the chronicles, that they massacred entire bodies who had laid down their arms; and if they made some prisoners, it was because they were tired of murdering. Pius the Fifth blamed the marshal de Tavannes very much, however, for sparing a single life, and to repair this fault he wrote at once to the king of France:—"In the name of Christ, we order you to hang or behead the prisoners whom you have made, without regard to learning, rank, sex, or age, without human respect or pity. Since it is well known that peace can never exist between the sons of Satan and the children of light, this race of impious wretches must not in future be permitted to multiply. Exterminate to the last these wicked heretics; the holocaust most agreeable to God, is the blood of the enemies of the Catholic religion; make it flow in floods upon his altars; and if you do not obey, remember the fate of Saul and the vengeance which that prince drew upon himself, because he did not put the king of the Amalekites to death."

In consequence of these recommendations, his majesty sent an order to the generalissimo of his army to put all his prisoners to death; which was done. The duke de Montpensier, one of the Catholic leaders, not having the courage to put to death the unfortunates who were entrusted to his keeping, handed them over to his almoner, the Jesuit Babelot, to do as he pleased. This wretch had the cruelty to trample children at the breast beneath his feet, to have the females violated, and to murder them himself, whilst the soldiers were assuaging their execrable licentiousness upon them; as for the men, he had them merely flayed alive or burned.

Pius the Fifth thought that the protestant party was ruined in France by the battle of Moncontour, and that the king could do the work alone; he then recalled the count de Santa Fiore, who was a burthen on his treasury. The entry of these troops into Rome, was celebrated as in the triumphal days of the generals of the republic. His holiness went, with all his clergy, two miles to meet them; he then had the flags taken from the Calvinists suspended in the church of St. John of the Lateran, and terminated the ceremony by announcing the end of heresy, and the triumph of Catholicism as certain.

Notwithstanding the predictions of the pope, the reformed, whom he had regarded as crushed, raised their heads and re-established their affairs so successfully, that the court trembled anew for the issue of the war. Then Catherine de Medicis, who dreaded to be besieged in Paris, had recourse to negotiations, and offered peace to the reformed with such advantageous conditions, that they would not have been able to impose others, even had their party triumphed over the Catholic army. Besides a general amnesty, they obtained the free exercise of their religion, the restitution of confiscated property, the privilege of presenting six judges in parliament, and the choice of four strong cities, with power to place garrisons in them.

It is just to say, that the fear which the Huguenots inspired, was not the sole motive for peace. The emperor Maximilian the Second, had made it one of the conditions he had imposed on the court of France, in exchange for his consent to the marriage of his daughter, Elizabeth of Austria, with Charles the Ninth. The cessation of hostilities again excited great discontent at Rome, and the holy father even dared to express his sentiments on the subject to the French ambassador, and to threaten the queen mother and her son, with excommunication, if they did not keep the oath they had taken to organise a vast conspiracy, to exterminate all the heretics of their kingdom. Catherine de Medicis and the cowardly Charles the Ninth, hastened to write to his holiness, that they had not renounced their plans, and were only taking their measures, so that none of their enemies could escape them.

Pius the Fifth appeared to be satisfied with the assurances they gave him, he blamed, however, the respect shown to Henry of Navarre, the admiral Coligny and the young Condé, and disapproved of the concessions which had been made to the heretics. Then, in order to punish Maximilian, whom he regarded as the principal author of this peace, he interfered in a question of precedence between the dukes of Ferrara and Florence, and which had been submitted for some years to the arbitration of the emperor, and usurping a right which did not belong to him, he decided the affair in the following bull:—"We, Pius the Fifth, the successor of the apostle Peter, the vicar of Christ, seated on the elevated throne of the church militant, and set by the Lord over nations and kings, order that our dear son, Como de Medicis, should wear a royal crown, and be called grand duke of Tuscany, by virtue of the supreme authority with which we are invested, and which gives us the right to distribute titles to princes, in the same manner that our first father Adam received from God the right to give names to animals." Maximilian, who did not share in the belief of the holy father on this subject, protested against this bull, and called his two vassals to his tribunal. Como de Medicis, in whose favour the decree was, declared the matter to be adjudicated, and refused to appear before his sovereign; the result was, a war between the two princes. This success emboldened the holy father, and determined him to strike a great blow, not in Germany, but in England; the object was no less than to have Queen Elizabeth assassinated, and to place the triple crown of England, Scotland, and Ireland, on the brow of Mary Stuart, then a prisoner in the castle of Fotheringay, and who was pledged by oath, to re-establish the Catholic religion in Great Britain. The Jesuits mutually entered into the views of the holy father, and organised a vast conspiracy. Unfortunately for them, on the eve of its execution a traitor sold them, and all paid with their heads for their participation in the plot. Pius the Fifth, furious at finding his plans discovered, immediately fulminated a bull against Elizabeth; he declared her excommunicated, freed her subjects from their oath of allegiance, and gave her kingdom to the first occupant.

This bold excommunication was affixed by John Felton, to the doors of the episcopal palace of London, and this intrepid disciple of Loyola, obtained as a recompense, the crown of martyrdom. An order of Elizabeth then declared all Jesuits banished from the kingdom, under penalty of death, if they dared to re-appear. Notwithstanding this edict, these courageous satellites of the Holy See, remained in Great Britain, concealed under different disguises, and ready to execute the orders of their general. Thus, before such devotion, Pius exclaimed, "Yes, with such men, will I triumph over kings, and exterminate people, if God will only grant me some years of life." In fact, the power of this society had so increased, that it threatened to substitute itself for the secular authority every where. In the Low Countries, thanks to the protection of the ferocious duke of Alba, the Jesuits had founded a colony at Anvers, and laboured openly for the ruin of Flanders and Holland. In Portugal, they had taken the regency from Queen Catherine, to give it to Cardinal Henry, who was affiliated with their society, and had even forced King Sebastian to take a member of their order as his preceptor, and another as his confessor, and the grand inquisitor as his minister. When this young prince, arrived at the age of manhood, wished to make an effort to free himself from odious tutelage, they threatened to burn him alive as a heretic, and became stronger than ever. In Germany, they had been enabled to establish colleges, notwithstanding the active opposition of the people, and although they were convicted of practising sodomy on the children confided to their care. In Spain they had become so powerful, that Philip the Second, fearful of displeasing them, authorised them to abandon themselves to strange and frequently obscene practices.

If any other than a Jesuit had left us an account of the means they employed to excite terror in the hearts of the faithful, we would accuse him of calumny; but it is a disciple of Ignatius Loyola, Father Orlandino, who speaks, "at certain festivals during the year, we traversed the streets by night, exclaiming in lugubrious and prophetic tones, 'Hell, hell, for men and women, who are now committing the sin of licentiousness.' In other solemnities our superiors order us, through a spirit of humility, to despoil us of our garments, and to go from door to door asking alms; we pay our devotions from church to church, without garments, flagellating each other, whilst the young novices thunder forth psalms."

In Sicily, adds another historian, they gave every year the spectacle of an allegorical procession, of which the subject was the power of death over all creatures. "On that day, all the Jesuits formed an immense troop; in front they carried a great image extended on a coffin; around this effigy of the Saviour, marched four ranks of angels, virgins, and saints, represented by lads or young girls, having no clothing but wings or garlands of flowers; behind them came lean and meagre horsemen, entirely naked, and mounted on horses, without bridle or saddle; then came Death, represented by a skeleton of more than a hundred feet high, holding a scythe in his right hand, carrying a bow and arrows on his shoulders, and having shovels, mattocks, and all the implements of a grave digger at his feet. This gigantic skeleton was placed on a car, decorated with black drapery, and drawn by twelve bulls, which the dean of the Jesuits, who represented Time, conducted. Other fathers, disguised as demons, surrounded the car, uttering terrible cries, and brandishing torches of rosin. Behind the car of Death pressed a crowd of spectres, representing all the conditions of life, and monks who sung hymns of death."

In Venice the Jesuits were held in great honour, and had it not been for their ardour in confessing women and young girls in their private apartments, it is probable they would have maintained it; but their great zeal in administering the sacrament of penance to the young dames, drew on them the hatred of the senators; and the doge having learned that his wife had been called to her confessor three times in one day, to obtain absolution from him, it was decided by the supreme council of Ten, that they should be expelled from its territory. They left it, to retire to Milan, to Charles Borromeo, the archbishop of that city, who avowed himself their protector, and gave them the direction of a college at Braida, and the control of a seminary, until they could return to Venice.

In the dominions of the duke of Savoy they had seized on all employments, and could, with impunity, violate women, or use young boys in their infamous pleasures. Moreover, one of them, Father Possevin, had placed himself at the head of bands, paid by the money of the pope, and was executing severe justice on the heretics of the dutchy. They triumphed in Poland, Sweden, and Norway; every where, in fine, they knew how to exercise their execrable sway, by becoming the confessors of princes and lords, and by selling their secrets to the court of Rome.

Pius the Fifth, finding himself so well served by his cohorts of Jesuits, conceived the plan of renewing the massacres of the Sicilian Vespers through all Europe, and of annihilating, at one blow, all the enemies of the Holy See. He accordingly wrote to Charles Borromeo, to employ himself in organising bands of murderers in Piedmont and Switzerland; he sent the cardinal Commandon to Poland to make overtures to Sigismund Augustus for the same end; he hastened his nephew, Cardinal Alexandrin, to the court of France, to arrange with Charles the Ninth on the means of exterminating the Calvinists of his kingdom; another legate went to Portugal, and another to Madrid, to induce those two sovereigns to enter this sacrilegious league. Venice even, could not resist the fatal influence of the court of Rome; she recalled the Jesuits, and they, from gratitude, organised a plot, and prepared to make rivers of blood to flow. Germany alone resisted the general impulse; Maximilian refused to associate himself in this work of iniquity, not from a sentiment of humanity, but from prudence, and because he felt a lively resentment towards the pope, for having pronounced judgment in the question of precedence between the dukes of Ferrara and Florence. Pius the Fifth was so enraged at being unable to surmount this last obstacle, which alone prevented him from putting his monstrous plot into execution, that he was attacked with a nervous fever, of which he died on the 1st of May, 1572, at the age of sixty-eight.

His death was a subject of joy for Italy, and especially for Rome. In one day, the holy city, which had been almost deserted, saw thousands of emigrants re-enter it; all the citizens embraced and congratulated each other on having escaped the terrible scourge which had decimated the population.

Still the sanguinary Pius the Fifth, that monster, who, according to the historian de Thou, had improved in refinements of punishments on the fabulous ferocity of Proustes and Gergon; that pope who had the execrable glory of surpassing the atrocities of the Neros, the Caligulas, the Domitians, and the Galbas; that executioner of humanity; that murderer of women, children, and old men; that organizer of the most frightful plot which has alarmed the world, of that Saint Bartholomew, which, four months later, was to cover France with a hundred thousand corpses, has found priests who have made a saint of him, and who, after having canonised him, have held him up as an example for the kings of Europe.

GREGORY THE THIRTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1572.]

Election of Gregory the Thirteenth—His history before his pontificate—The massacre of St. Bartholomew—Discourse of the cardinal Montalto on it—Fetes and rejoicings at Rome in honour of it—Gregory receives the head of the admiral Coligny at a public audience—He continues the work of Pius the Fifth—Organization of the league—Gregory conspires against Elizabeth of England—Revolt in Ireland—The Jesuits endeavour to foment troubles in England—Philip seizes the crown of Portugal—New edict of Elizabeth against the Jesuits—The pope is occupied with the interests of his bastard—He labours to reform the calendar, and causes the Gregorian calendar to be adopted in Europe—He calls the knights of Malta before his tribunal—His admonition to the archbishop of Cologne—Famine and seditions at Rome—Quarrel between the courts of France and Rome—The pontiff wishes to excommunicate the princes of Navarre and Condé—His death.

As soon as the ferocious Pius the Fifth had breathed forth his last sigh, the Camerlingo took measures to prevent the people from forcing the gates of the palace and carrying off the dead body, to drag it through the streets of Rome, which they would not have failed to do, so great was the hatred this monster inspired. After the obsequies, the conclave formed, and the intrigues began; it was soon seen that the Spanish party had the majority. The candidates proposed by Charles Borromeo, and the cardinal Alexandrin, were all successively defeated, and the suffrages were given to the cardinal Buoncompagno. Monseigneur de Verceil then went to the chamber of this cardinal, took him by the hand, besought him to follow him to the chapel of the conclave, there to receive the adoration, and immediately proclaimed him sovereign pontiff, by the name of Gregory the Thirteenth.

The new pope was born at Bologna, about the beginning of the sixteenth century; his father was named Christopher, and his mother Agniola Marescalchi. He at first studied the law, and obtained the grade of doctor at the age of twenty-eight; he then taught as a professor in the university of his native city until 1539. At that period he renounced his professorship, to embrace the ecclesiastical state, which was in fact much more lucrative, and led more quickly to honours and power. He came to Rome, and obtained from Paul the Third the post of abbreviator, then that of keeper of the seals; it was in this capacity that he assisted at the council of Trent. As a recompense for the services he rendered the Holy See in this assembly, the pope appointed him auditor of the chamber; Julius the Third afterwards raised him to the post of secretary of the apostolic chamber, and gave him a vice legation in the territory of Rome. During the reign of Paul the Fourth he bought the dignity of bishop, and finally, under the pontificate of Pius the Fourth, he became rich enough to pay for a cardinal's hat.

The first use which he made of the supreme power was, to grant to the envoys of France a dispensation, which was solicited by Charles the Ninth, for the marriage of his sister Margaret with Henry of Navarre. "This union," the king had said to Cardinal Alexandrin, the nephew of Pius the Fifth, "assures to us more than ever, the success of our plans for the extermination of the heretics."

Indeed, Catherine de Medicis, and her execrable son, far from having abandoned their criminal designs, waited but for the moment when they could finish with their enemies by a general massacre. To attain this, they stopped at nothing; knavery, deceit, treason, every thing was set to work. At last, to draw the chiefs of the Huguenots into their power, they had proposed to Jane d'Albret, queen of Navarre, to marry the prince of Bearn, her son, to Margaret of Valois; and they offered to admiral Coligny, to place him at the head of an army of invasion, destined to conquer the Low Countries from Philip the Second. Seduced by all these marks of confidence, the Huguenots abandoned their habitual reserve, and came to Paris; the admiral himself, flattered in his vanity, came to court, without paying regard to the advice of his friends to distrust the Guises. The queen of Navarre followed his example, yielded to the solicitations of the king, and came also to Paris, to assist at the wedding of her son. The welcome she received; the infinite attentions, the marked courtesies of which she was the object from Catherine de Medicis and Charles the Ninth, served to dissipate her apprehensions, and she abandoned herself in full security to the caresses of her assassins. Twenty days afterwards she died from poison.

Henry of Navarre, become king by the death of Jane, scarcely waited until the funeral of his mother was over, when he consummated his marriage with Margaret of Valois.

At last, all having been prepared for the extermination of the Huguenots, on a fixed day, couriers were despatched in all directions, and bore secret orders to the governors of the provinces; then, on the Eve of St. Bartholomew, a night for ever memorable, at a signal given from the Louvre, troops of murderers rushed upon the houses inhabited by the protestants, and in less than forty-eight hours, thirty thousand French, men, women, children, and old men, fell beneath the blows of these wretches.

In the provinces the butcheries were prolonged for two months, and more than seventy thousand Calvinists were assassinated by the Catholics. Thus was accomplished the infernal work which the sainted pope, Pius the Fifth, had prepared with so much solicitude.

This general massacre of the Huguenots, followed so closely on the election of Gregory the Thirteenth, that it was destined to serve as a fête for his coronation. The pontiff received the news with inexpressible joy; he caused the cannon in the castle of San Angelo to be fired, commanded public rejoicings to celebrate the triumph of the holy cause, and then published a jubilee through Europe, "in order," he said, "that the Catholics might rejoice with their head at that magnificent holocaust offered to the papacy by the king of France."

When the envoys of Charles the Ninth reached Rome, his holiness wished that they should hand to him, in a solemn audience, the letters of the court of France, and the strange present which Catherine de Medicis sent him. "It was the head of the admiral Coligny," says Brantome, "whom the mother and son, those crowned murderers, had sundered from his noble body, and which they sent to the pope, as the most agreeable offering they could make to the vicar of Christ."

Gregory received this head with transports of ferocious joy, and in testimony of his gratitude to the king, he sent him a magnificent blessed sword, on which was represented an exterminating angel. The cardinal Flavins Orsini was, on this occasion, appointed legate à latere for the kingdom of France, and was commissioned to prevent the prince from leaving the path on which his mother had induced him to enter. Then every where, in the churches of Italy, at Rome, Naples, Florence, and even Venice, yet always at the instigation of the Jesuits, the preachers thundered forth a concert of extravagant eulogiums on the king of France and the queen mother, in order to excite the fanaticism of other sovereigns. Ecclesiastics were found, who, in their sermons, went into extacies over the infinite mildness and merciful clemency of the murderer of the Huguenots, admired the skill and persevering obstinacy which he had exhibited in carrying out a plot, which was, according to them, the most glorious, most sublime, and most extraordinary exploit which had ever been accomplished by kings. "Oh! admirable resolution," exclaimed one of these furious preachers, in a moment of inspiration, "Oh, truly royal soul! glory, eternal glory to Charles the Ninth, the greatest of kings, who did not recoil before the massacre of his subjects! may his name descend to posterity with the admiration it inspires in me, and may his example be followed by all the princes of the earth."

Gregory, desirous of perpetuating the memory of this bloody triumph, called to him the most skilful painters, and ordered from them several pictures representing different episodes of the St. Bartholomew. Amongst other things, there were represented in the hall called the Hall of the Kings, in the Vatican, three frescos; the first represented the time when the admiral Coligny was assailed on leaving the Louvre; the second represented a scene of carnage by the light of torches, and the third showed Charles the Ninth presiding over parliament, and glorifying himself for having exterminated a hundred thousand French heretics.

Whilst the holy father and his cohorts of Jesuits were exalting the virtues of Charles the Ninth and his infamous mother, the Spaniards were continuing their ravages in Flanders, and were committing such atrocities, that it appeared as if the duke of Alba had sworn to surpass the king of France himself.

Malines was abandoned to pillage for three days, and the soldiers committed excesses, before unknown, on the unfortunate inhabitants; to the sack of this city succeeded the massacres of Zutphen and Haerden; after the ruin of these unfortunate towns, took place the butchery of Harlem, in which more than ten thousand Belgians were slain on the ramparts, nearly two thousand burned or tortured, and double that number drowned in the river, the executioners having no longer strength to murder. At last blood flowed so abundantly, that the cruel Philip himself wished to suspend the executions, from fear lest his terrible governor should finish by annihilating the entire population, and he recalled the duke of Alba to Spain. It is said, that this monster before quitting the Low Countries, boasted, at a sumptuous banquet which he gave his officers, of having put death more than a hundred thousand Belgians by the swords of his soldiers, with having tortured or beheaded twenty thousand, and with having stolen from the inhabitants more than eight millions of ducats yearly.

Gregory the Thirteenth, faithful to the encroaching policy of the Holy See, was not content with the mere defeat of the heretics; he wanted his share of their spoils, and to have the decrees of the council of Trent adopted in France, which had been until now rejected by the parliament, as prejudicial to the national liberties. But the urgency of his holiness became baneful to the cause of Catholicism; the pretensions of the court of Rome excited a general discontent; the Huguenots profited by it to retake the offensive, and when Catherine de Medicis thought them crushed, they rose every where, fell upon the cities which were ungarrisoned, fortified them, and announced that they were going to the Louvre to demand a terrible reckoning for the massacre of their brethren.

Charles the Ninth, justly alarmed by these threats, became cowardly and suppliant before those whom he had just endeavoured to murder; he threw the horrors of the St. Bartholomew on the Guises and the court of Rome; he employed solicitations and promises with the reformed; he ordered the confiscated property to be restored to them, notwithstanding the opposition of the legate, who claimed a part of it for the Holy See, and even offered to declare himself the protector of the reformed religion.

The Huguenots, who knew from experience the value to be set on the oath of a king, refused to lay aside their arms, and the war commenced terribly. The duke of Anjou, with a formidable army, came to lay siege to Rochelle, the bulwark of the protestants, but at the first assault was repulsed with the loss of more than twenty thousand men, although his troops were much superior in number to the protestants. In his retreat, the prince, like a worthy brother of Charles the Ninth, revenged himself, for his disgrace, on the unfortunate city of Saucerre, whose inhabitants he put to the sword. He would, doubtless, not have been content with the massacre of a single city, if he had not been recalled to Paris by his mother, Catherine de Medicis, to receive the crown of Poland, which deputies from that kingdom had come to offer him.

The pope, who knew the depraved character of Henry of Anjou, a mixture of baseness, fanaticism, and cruelty, hastened to send him a nuncio, to congratulate him on his election, and on the massacre of the heretics of Saucerre. He offered him, at the same time, a rose of gold, in testimony of his high esteem, and to encourage him to show himself a worthy son of the church, by subjecting his new subjects to the court of Rome. The duke of Anjou then went to his kingdom of Poland. The queen mother then finding herself alone in opposition to the Guises, and fearing lest they should have too much power in the kingdom, took the side of Henry of Navarre and the prince of Condé, and showed herself favourable to the reformed. This conduct naturally discontented the legate, who leagued himself with the cardinal Lorraine. He promised him, in the name of the holy father, to favour the family of the Guises, and aid them in their plans of usurpation, should the throne become vacant by the death of Charles the Ninth, which his constant sickness rendered probable, if, on their side, they would pledge themselves to employ all their efforts to make the papacy triumph over the heretics. These conditions being agreed to, the Jesuits at once received orders from their general, to work under the direction of the cardinal Lorraine, "that debaucher of women," as Brantome calls him, "that grand master of lewdness, who by largesses, flatteries, or promises, secured, ensnared, or debauched all the girls or women who came to court."

He pursued the old plans of the league with more ardour than ever; and to increase the number of the affiliated, they gave a political and religious aim to the association. The Guises accordingly engaged "to restore to the provinces of the beautiful kingdom of France, the old rights, pre-eminences, franchises, and liberties, as they existed in the time of king Clovis." . . . and even yet better and more profitable, if they could invent them.

When all the articles of this new compact were agreed upon, the cardinal of Lorraine sent them to Gregory the Thirteenth, to obtain his sanction, and to cause him to have them adopted by the legions of monks and priests who covered France.

Soon, in all the churches, nothing was preached but the necessity of a league against the protestants. The priests exacted from Holy See in this assembly, the pope appointed him auditor of the chamber; Julius the Third afterwards raised him to the post of secretary of the apostolic chamber, and gave him a vice legation in the territory of Rome. During the reign of Paul the Fourth he bought the dignity of bishop, and finally, under the pontificate of Pius the Fourth, he became rich enough to pay for a cardinal's hat.

The first use which he made of the supreme power was, to grant to the envoys of France a dispensation, which was solicited by Charles the Ninth, for the marriage of his sister Margaret with Henry of Navarre. "This union," the king had said to Cardinal Alexandrin, the nephew of Pius the Fifth, "assures to us more than ever, the success of our plans for the extermination of the heretics."

Indeed, Catherine de Medicis, and her execrable son, far from having abandoned their criminal designs, waited but for the moment when they could finish with their enemies by a general massacre. To attain this, they stopped at nothing; knavery, deceit, treason, every thing was set to work. At last, to draw the chiefs of the Huguenots into their power, they had proposed to Jane d'Albret, queen of Navarre, to marry the prince of Bearn, her son, to Margaret of Valois; and they offered to admiral Coligny, to place him at the head of an army of invasion, destined to conquer the Low Countries from Philip the Second. Seduced by all these marks of confidence, the Huguenots abandoned their habitual reserve, and came to Paris; the admiral himself, flattered in his vanity, came to court, without paying regard to the advice of his friends to distrust the Guises. The queen of Navarre followed his example, yielded to the solicitations of the king, and came also to Paris, to assist at the wedding of her son. The welcome she received; the infinite attentions, the marked courtesies of which she was the object from Catherine de Medicis and Charles the Ninth, served to dissipate her apprehensions, and she abandoned herself in full security to the caresses of her assassins. Twenty days afterwards she died from poison.

Henry of Navarre, become king by the death of Jane, scarcely waited until the funeral of his mother was over, when he consummated his marriage with Margaret of Valois.

At last, all having been prepared for the extermination of the Huguenots, on a fixed day, couriers were despatched in all directions, and bore secret orders to the governors of the provinces; then, on the Eve of St. Bartholomew, a night for ever memorable, at a signal given from the Louvre, troops of murderers rushed upon the houses inhabited by the protestants, and in less than forty-eight hours, thirty thousand French, men, women, children, and old men, fell beneath the blows of these wretches.

In the provinces the butcheries were prolonged for two months, and more than seventy thousand Calvinists were assassinated by the Catholics. Thus was accomplished the infernal work which the sainted pope, Pius the Fifth, had prepared with so much solicitude.

This general massacre of the Huguenots, followed so closely on the election of Gregory the Thirteenth, that it was destined to serve as a fête for his coronation. The pontiff received the news with inexpressible joy; he caused the cannon in the castle of San Angelo to be fired, commanded public rejoicings to celebrate the triumph of the holy cause, and then published a jubilee through Europe, "in order," he said, "that the Catholics might rejoice with their head at that magnificent holocaust offered to the papacy by the king of France."

When the envoys of Charles the Ninth reached Rome, his holiness wished that they should hand to him, in a solemn audience, the letters of the court of France, and the strange present which Catherine de Medicis sent him. "It was the head of the admiral Coligny," says Brantome, "whom the mother and son, those crowned murderers, had sundered from his noble body, and which they sent to the pope, as the most agreeable offering they could make to the vicar of Christ."

Gregory received this head with transports of ferocious joy, and in testimony of his gratitude to the king, he sent him a magnificent blessed sword, on which was represented an exterminating angel. The cardinal Flavio Orsini was, on this occasion, appointed legate à latere for the kingdom of France, and was commissioned to prevent the prince from leaving the path on which his mother had induced him to enter. Then every where, in the churches of Italy, at Rome, Naples, Florence, and even Venice, yet always at the instigation of the Jesuits, the preachers thundered forth a concert of extravagant eulogiums on the king of France and the queen mother, in order to excite the fanaticism of other sovereigns. Ecclesiastics were found, who, in their sermons, went into extacies over the infinite mildness and merciful clemency of the murderer of the Huguenots, admired the skill and persevering obstinacy which he had exhibited in carrying out a plot, which was, according to them, the most glorious, most sublime, and most extraordinary exploit which had ever been accomplished by kings. "Oh! admirable resolution," exclaimed one of these furious preachers, in a moment of inspiration, "Oh, truly royal soul! glory, eternal glory to Charles the Ninth, the greatest of kings, who did not recoil before the massacre of his subjects! may his name descend to posterity with the admiration it inspires in me, and may his example be followed by all the princes of the earth."

Gregory, desirous of perpetuating the memory of this bloody triumph, called to him the most skilful painters, and ordered from them several pictures representing different episodes of the St. Bartholomew. Amongst other things, there were represented in the hall called the Hall of the Kings, in the Vatican, three frescos; the first represented the time when the admiral Coligny was assailed on leaving the Louvre; the second represented a scene of carnage by the light of torches, and the third showed Charles the Ninth preading the Jesuits, replied, that his majesty had no other part to take but to reduce France to an unity in religion, that is, to the exclusive exercise of the papist, and for that purpose he should continue the massacres of the reformed. Henry the Third then joined the league, and was proclaimed its chief. Still, however, he was careful to change its ancient statutes, and to strike out the clauses which were hostile to the royal dignity; he then caused the new regulations to be accepted by the states, and ordered that they should be promulgated as obligatory through the whole extent of his kingdom. After so solemn a declaration, we should suppose that the war with the Huguenots would have recommenced with new fury; it was not so, however; the king had no money to levy troops, and the states refused to grant it. Henry, alarmed by his position, seeing himself the head of a league which hated him, and the but of the duke of Guise, who in every circumstance affected to treat him with contempt, entered into negotiations with the Huguenot princes, and concluded the peace of Poitiers with them. By this treaty the reformed acquired the right of building churches and holding synods; the enjoyment of their wealth and dignities was moreover restored to them; the memory of the admiral Coligny, as well of that of the other victims of the St. Bartholomew, was restored; finally, his majesty authorised the marriage of priests.

This edict, loyally executed, would have doubtless restored prosperity to the kingdom; but no one believed in the sincerity of Henry the Third; and moreover, the pope and the duke of Guise were too much interested in perpetuating the disorders, not to use their efforts to kindle a more active and bloodier civil war than ever. His holiness first sent to France the Jesuit Henry Sammier, a man full of finesse and astuteness, accustomed to take all kinds of disguises, to play all kinds of parts, who was in fine the most skilful diplomatist of that period, and he instructed him to kindle the fire of revolt. Henry of Guise, also recruited a number of ambitious men, of people without occupation, taken from all classes in society, whom he knew how to attach to himself through hopes of pillage, and he formed an army of them. The duke assumed the airs of a king more than ever, and showed his disdain for Henry the Third, so that the latter feared lest he should make an attempt on his life, and to guard against this danger, he instituted an order composed of an hundred persons of the first nobility, which he called the order of the Holy Spirit. He appointed twenty-seven knights and four great officers, who were all bound by oath to expose their property and their lives in defence of the king and religion. He inaugurated this society at Pentecost, the day of his birth, and which through a strange coincidence was also the anniversary of his coronation as king of Poland, and that of the death of Charles the Ninth. He gave the title of commanders to the members of this order, designing to provide them all with commanderies and rich benefices.

The example of the king of France was followed by the court of Rome, and Gregory the Thirteenth sought to create new defenders of it. He re-established the order of St. Basil, which had once counted five hundred monasteries in the kingdom of Naples alone, and decreed that all the Hieronmites in the west should hereafter form but one congregation, submitted to a single abbot who should receive his instructions from the Holy See; he then founded twenty colleges or seminaries at Rome, governed by the Jesuits, who were under his jurisdiction, and who were destined for the English, Germans, Greeks, Maronites, Jews, atheists and repentants; finally, he extended his foundations into Bohemia, Moravia, Lithuania, Transylvania, and even Japan. The care which Gregory gave to the organization of these establishments, which were to prepare the subjugation of new generations to the Holy See, by rendering it the master of the education of youth, did not, however, hinder him from exciting people against each other, and from preparing bloody revolutions in all the kingdoms of Europe. Thus he used to advantage the sojourn of Don Juan of Austria at Rome, to induce that prince to adopt a plan of conspiracy against Elizabeth, which consisted in nothing less than having her assassinated, so as to deliver Mary Stuart, and to arrange a marriage between him and the new queen of England. The only obstacle which prevented the execution of the designs of the pontiff, being the interference of the Hollanders, he advised Don Juan to take the government of the Low Countries, so as to keep the prince of Orange, who was then sovereign of all Holland, in check, and to prevent him from succouring the heretics of Great Britain. The prince assented to his reasoning, and went in haste to assume the government of his province to recommence the massacres of the ferocious duke of Alba.

From that time the efforts and intrigues of the court of Rome became very active in England, and all the Catholics made ready to second the reactionary movement. But Elizabeth was on her guard, the plot was discovered, and several Jesuits paid with their heads for their devotion to the pope. The queen did not confine herself to some partial executions; she renewed the laws against the Catholics, took their churches from them, drove them from their convents, prohibited them from assembling, and deprived them of the free exercise of their religion.

Gregory was not beaten down by this first reverse; he did not renounce the hope of placing Mary Stuart and Don Juan on the throne of England, and of re-establishing Catholicism in the British isles; he only made a change in his policy, and determined to begin by crushing the protestants of Holland before attacking those of Great Britain. For this purpose he sent to Don Juan a nuncio named Sega, who was the bearer of large sums, which were to be used in levying troops and subsidising spies and assassins. This ecclesiastic had moreover an ample provision of briefs to grant plenary indulgences to the fanatics who should combat beneath the standard of the Roman church, whatever might have been the enormity of their crimes.

It was time for Don Juan to receive aid, for he was absolutely without money, and almost without soldiers; his precarious position had already even forced him to enter into an arrangement with the Belgians, and to give his approval to an edict which had been decreed by an assembly of the states at the city of Ghent, and which was called the edict of the pacification of Ghent. But he scarcely believed himself in a condition to resist the Belgians, when he broke the treaty consented to by the reformed in Holland and Zealand, and retook all the pride and insolence of a tyrant. It turned out illy for the governor; the people of Brussels took up arms, drove him with his soldiers from their city, called in the prince of Orange and conferred on him the dictatorship of the Low Countries. The Catholic nobles alone refused to recognise the prince of Orange as their chief; as, however, they bore an equal hatred to the Spaniards and the reformed, they ranged themselves under the banners of the archduke Mathias, the brother of the new emperor Rodolph, who had succeeded Maximilian the Second. The burghers, wiser than the nobles, preferred the public safety to the triumph of their cause, and in order to give no pretext to the latter for retiring from the struggle, they gave the exercise of power to Mathias, and contented themselves with placing the prince of Orange in his council as his lieutenant.

Philip the Second, finding himself on the eve of losing the Low Countries, from having wished to follow the counsels of the pope, then determined to conduct his affairs his own way. He first sent Duke Alexander Farnese, with a numerous army, into Belgium, to reconquer the provinces and cities which had revolted. This unfortunate country then found itself rent by four factions, which all disputed for the territory with arms in their hands. On one side, the republicans sought to overthrow the party of the priests; on the other Mathias and Don Juan, both making powerful efforts to sustain themselves on a bloody throne. In this strife the wary Mathias gained ground upon his adversary daily. Understanding the necessity he was under of sustaining himself by the people, he was careful to declare in favour of freedom of conscience, and to rebuild the protestant churches which had been burned in Brabant, Flanders, and Gueldres. This act of tolerance excited, it is true, the anger of the Jesuits, the priests, and the monks; but he did not disturb himself about them, and contented himself with banishing those who refused to take the oath of obedience to the constitution.

In the mean time Don Juan of Austria died, and was replaced in his government by Prince Alexander of Parma, a bigoted Catholic, who aspired to the glory of surpassing the duke of Alba in cruelty. He first murdered twelve thousand inhabitants of Maestrich, to punish them for having defended their walls for eight months of a rigorous blockade. He then turned his attention to exciting discord among the Flemings, by flattering the Catholic nobility, and ratifying the perpetual edict; this succeeded marvellously, and induced the desertion of the lords, and consequently that of the Catholic soldiers, who were designated by the nickname of the soldiers of Pater Noster. This defection determined the United Provinces to take a vigorous resolution to deprive Mathias of the government, to offer it to the duke of Alençon, become duke of Anjou, since the elevation of Henry the Third to the throne of France: the deputies of the states made him swear to a constitution, which was equally favourable to Catholics and protestants, and declared themselves for ever freed from the sway of Philip the Second. Thus, this time, did the efforts of the court of Rome against the reformed of Belgium and Holland, meet with a complete check. Gregory then fell back on Great Britain, with which he had not ceased to carry on communications. By his orders, bands of Jesuits passed over into Ireland to prepare an insurrection against the queen, and when all was ready, Italian troops embarked at Civita Vecchia, under the leading of an English Catholic, to make a descent on the shores of Ireland.

His holiness did not confine himself to this demonstration against Elizabeth; he instituted an order of missionaries to go into England to preach revolt, and formed a cohort of sixty-four English, Scotch, and Irish Jesuits, who took an oath to employ all their efforts, and even to suffer martyrdom, in order to wrest life and crown from the heretic princess who reigned over the British isles. These fanatics left Italy, and went to London, to seek the glorious palm which was to place them among the saints. But only three of them perished; Campian, Skerwin, and Bryant, denounced as instigators of a plot against the life of the sovereign, were strangled, beheaded, and quartered. The pope canonised them at once, and ordered the survivors to organise a new conspiracy, taking their measures better.

In Portugal the children of Ignatius had greatly advanced their affairs, and had become so formidable, that the imbecile Sebastian, the king of that country, not daring to resist their solicitations, made a descent on Africa, and was slain at the battle of Alcacer. The sceptre passed from the hands of this unskilful king, into those of an old priestly debauchee, the cardinal Henry, the uncle of Sebastian, moulded, like his nephew, into a blind obedience to the Jesuits. As soon as he was king, he conceived the singular fancy of having heirs, and solicited a dispensation from Rome to enable him to marry a young mistress, whom the Jesuits had given him. Gregory, who coveted the heritage of the kingdom of Portugal for his family, represented to the cardinal king, that it would be giving a dangerous advantage to the heretics, to grant to a man of his rank, who had been so many years an ecclesiastic, permission to break his vow of continence openly, in order to espouse his concubine. Philip the Second, who also had pretensions on this kingdom, influenced the opinion of the court of Rome, and threatened the old cardinal with an invasion of Portugal, if he did not submit to the prohibition of the holy father. Henry languished for eighteen months, balancing between the two, when he died, and left the field open to their ambitious views.

Philip sent an army at once into Portugal, and seized on it, notwithstanding the clamours of the Jesuits, and the wrath of Gregory the Thirteenth, who destined this crown for his bastard, James Buoncompagno. His holiness dared not, however, excommunicate the king of Spain, whose assistance he required to strengthen the manœuvres of the Catholic league in France, to assure the triumph of religion in the Low Countries, and to overthrow Elizabeth of England. He even cloaked his resentment, and sent to congratulate Philip on his new conquest, excusing himself for not having favoured him, and only claiming some pensions and towns for his son James, which were liberally granted him.

Thus Gregory, though pre-occupied with the interests of the Holy See, did not forget his family. We must also do him this justice, that he gave more assistance to the progress of science than any of his predecessors had done. Among the reforms which the learned demanded, there was one most necessary, since it produced great trouble in chronological arrangement—it was the revision of the calendar. From bad calculations, errors so gross had glided into the computation of time, that the festivals of the church were inverted. Several popes, scandalized at seeing Easter come at the period fixed for the festival of the Trinity, had already endeavoured, but in vain, to correct this error of calculation. Gregory had the good sense to call to his aid the learned of all nations, and they published, under the superintendence of the celebrated doctor Louis Lilion, the calendar we now use, and which is called the Gregorian. All the Catholic states immediately adopted this new division of time.

Gregory purchased this feeble service to the sciences by so much wickedness, that hatred was stronger than gratitude, and a concert of curses rose against him from every quarter. In the states of the church the misery was at its height; Milan was desolated by two terrible scourges, the plague and its archbishop Charles Borromeo; Rome even was in a state of famine, in consequence of the avarice of the sovereign pontiff and his bastard, who had monopolised the corn, to carry on a scandalous traffic in it. Bands were soon formed, which infested the highways, robbed travellers, carried off convoys, and made incursions up to the gates of the holy city. The unfortunate, whom hunger and despair had urged on to crime, were abetted by some powerful lords, who hated the tyranny of Gregory, and gave an asylum in their palaces to the banditti. As soon as his holiness was apprised of this, he ordered his provost to make minute examinations in all the residences in the environs of Rome, and particularly in the palace of Raymond des Ursini, who had been denounced to him. The sbirri of the pontiff executed the orders they had received, and arrested several inoffensive persons whom they found in the residence of Raymond des Ursini. As they were about to bind them to conduct them to the castle of San Angelo, the master of the palace arrived with some of his people; he entreated the provost to set at liberty his prisoners, who were illegally arrested in a palace which enjoyed the right of asylum. The latter replied, insolently, that no consideration would prevent him from executing the orders of the pope, against such miscreants as him and his friends. This insult exasperated Raymond; he seized the arm of the provost, and struck him with a small stick he held in his hand; his sbirri immediately fired, killed this lord, and wounded five of his people. This act of hateful brutality excited a violent sedition at Rome; the people ran to arms, and threatened to besiege the Vatican, unless Gregory beheaded at once the provost and soldiers, who had assassinated Raymond des Ursini.

Gregory, cowardly as are all despots, had the sbirri who had executed his orders seized and shot, to save his own life. The provost, who had escaped, having been arrested, was beheaded. But as the real criminal was not reached, the brother of Raymond excited a new sedition, attacked the palace of Vincent Vitelli, the grandson of the pope, and son of James Buoncompagno, and slew him with his own hand. He then left Rome with a crowd of discontented persons, organised them into free companies, and made incursions at their head upon the territories of the church, and exercised cruel reprisals to avenge his family. The disquiet which this partizan war caused the pontiff, did not prevent him from pursuing his projects on the Low Countries, in which, whilst appearing to sustain the interests of Philip, he was secretly favouring the duke of Anjou. The money required to pay the French troops beginning to fail him, he determined to finish the war at a blow, and to have the duke of Orleans, the most formidable of the enemies of the Holy See, assassinated. At his instigation, the Jesuits armed a fanatic, named Jaregué, who was born in Biscay; and one day, when the prince was leaving his hotel, he shot a pistol at him, which fortunately only grazed his breast. This wretch was massacred on the spot by the people. His accomplices were sought out, and among others, a Dominican named Anthony Timmermans, who had given him absolution before he made the attempt.

The duke of Anjou was at first accused of having participated in this plot; but the prince of Orange exonerated him before the states-general, and showed them that the blow had sums, which were to be used in levying troops and subsidising spies and assassins. This ecclesiastic had moreover an ample provision of briefs to grant plenary indulgences to the fanatics who should combat beneath the standard of the Roman church, whatever might have been the enormity of their crimes.

It was time for Don Juan to receive aid, for he was absolutely without money, and almost without soldiers; his precarious position had already even forced him to enter into an arrangement with the Belgians, and to give his approval to an edict which had been decreed by an assembly of the states at the city of Ghent, and which was called the edict of the pacification of Ghent. But he scarcely believed himself in a condition to resist the Belgians, when he broke the treaty consented to by the reformed in Holland and Zealand, and retook all the pride and insolence of a tyrant. It turned out ill for the governor; the people of Brussels took up arms, drove him with his soldiers from their city, called in the prince of Orange and conferred on him the dictatorship of the Low Countries. The Catholic nobles alone refused to recognise the prince of Orange as their chief; as, however, they bore an equal hatred to the Spaniards and the reformed, they ranged themselves under the banners of the archduke Mathias, the brother of the new emperor Rodolph, who had succeeded Maximilian the Second. The burghers, wiser than the nobles, preferred the public safety to the triumph of their cause, and in order to give no pretext to the latter for retiring from the struggle, they gave the exercise of power to Mathias, and contented themselves with placing the prince of Orange in his council as his lieutenant.

Philip the Second, finding himself on the eve of losing the Low Countries, from having wished to follow the counsels of the pope, then determined to conduct his affairs his own way. He first sent Duke Alexander Farnese, with a numerous army, into Belgium, to reconquer the provinces and cities which had revolted. This unfortunate country then found itself rent by four factions, which all disputed for the territory with arms in their hands. On one side, the republicans sought to overthrow the party of the priests; on the other Mathias and Don Juan, both making powerful efforts to sustain themselves on a bloody throne. In this strife the wary Mathias gained ground upon his adversary daily. Understanding the necessity he was under of sustaining himself by the people, he was careful to declare in favour of freedom of conscience, and to rebuild the protestant churches which had been burned in Brabant, Flanders, and Gueldres. This act of tolerance excited, it is true, the anger of the Jesuits, the priests, and the monks; but he did not disturb himself about them, and contented himself with banishing those who refused to take the oath of obedience to the constitution.

In the mean time Don Juan of Austria died, and was replaced in his government by Prince Alexander of Parma, a bigoted Catholic, who aspired to the glory of surpassing the duke of Alba in cruelty. He first murdered twelve thousand inhabitants of Maestrich, to punish them for having defended their walls for eight months of a rigorous blockade. He then turned his attention to exciting discord among the Flemings, by flattering the Catholic nobility, and ratifying the perpetual edict; this succeeded marvellously, and induced the desertion of the lords, and consequently that of the Catholic soldiers, who were designated by the nickname of the soldiers of Pater Noster. This defection determined the United Provinces to take a vigorous resolution to deprive Mathias of the government, to offer it to the duke of Alençon, become duke of Anjou, since the elevation of Henry the Third to the throne of France: the deputies of the states made him swear to a constitution, which was equally favourable to Catholics and protestants, and declared themselves for ever freed from the sway of Philip the Second. Thus, this time, did the efforts of the court of Rome against the reformed of Belgium and Holland, meet with a complete check. Gregory then fell back on Great Britain, with which he had not ceased to carry on communications. By his orders, bands of Jesuits passed over into Ireland to prepare an insurrection against the queen, and when all was ready, Italian troops embarked at Civita Vecchia, under the leading of an English Catholic, to make a descent on the shores of Ireland.

His holiness did not confine himself to this demonstration against Elizabeth; he instituted an order of missionaries to go into England to preach revolt, and formed a cohort of sixty-four English, Scotch, and Irish Jesuits, who took an oath to employ all their efforts, and even to suffer martyrdom, in order to wrest life and crown from the heretic princess who reigned over the British isles. These fanatics left Italy, and went to London, to seek the glorious palm which was to place them among the saints. But only three of them perished; Campian, Skerwin, and Bryant, denounced as instigators of a plot against the life of the sovereign, were strangled, beheaded, and quartered. The pope canonised them at once, and ordered the survivors to organise a new conspiracy, taking their measures better.

In Portugal the children of Ignatius had greatly advanced their affairs, and had become so formidable, that the imbecile Sebastian, the king of that country, not daring to resist their solicitations, made a descent on Africa, and was slain at the battle of Alcacer. The sceptre passed from the hands of this unskilful king, into those of an old priestly debauchee, the cardinal Henry, the uncle of Sebastian, moulded, like his nephew, into a blind obedience to the Jesuits. As soon as he was king, he conceived the singular fancy of having heirs, and solicited a dispensation from Rome to enable him to marry a young mistress, whom the Jesuits had given him. Gregory, who coveted the heritage of the kingdom of Portugal for his family, represented to the cardinal king, that it would be giving a dangerous advantage to the heretics, to grant to a man of his rank, who had been so many years an ecclesiastic, permission to break his vow of continence openly, in order to espouse his concubine. Philip the Second, who also had pretensions on this kingdom, influenced the opinion of the court of Rome, and threatened the old cardinal with an invasion of Portugal, if he did not submit to the prohibition of the holy father. Henry languished for eighteen months, balancing between the two, when he died, and left the field open to their ambitious views.

Philip sent an army at once into Portugal, and seized on it, notwithstanding the clamours of the Jesuits, and the wrath of Gregory the Thirteenth, who destined this crown for his bastard, James Buoncompagno. His holiness dared not, however, excommunicate the king of Spain, whose assistance he required to strengthen the manœuvres of the Catholic league in France, to assure the triumph of religion in the Low Countries, and to overthrow Elizabeth of England. He even cloaked his resentment, and sent to congratulate Philip on his new conquest, excusing himself for not having favoured him, and only claiming some pensions and towns for his son James, which were liberally granted him.

Thus Gregory, though pre-occupied with the interests of the Holy See, did not forget his family. We must also do him this justice, that he gave more assistance to the progress of science than any of his predecessors had done. Among the reforms which the learned demanded, there was one most necessary, since it produced great trouble in chronological arrangement—it was the revision of the calendar. From bad calculations, errors so gross had glided into the computation of time, that the festivals of the church were inverted. Several popes, scandalized at seeing Easter come at the period fixed for the festival of the Trinity, had already endeavoured, but in vain, to correct this error of calculation. Gregory had the good sense to call to his aid the learned of all nations, and they published, under the superintendence of the celebrated doctor Louis Lilion, the calendar we now use, and which is called the Gregorian. All the Catholic states immediately adopted this new division of time.

Gregory purchased this feeble service to the sciences by so much wickedness, that hatred was stronger than gratitude, and a concert of curses rose against him from every quarter. In the states of the church the misery was at its height; Milan was desolated by two terrible scourges, the plague and its archbishop Charles Borromeo; Rome even was in a state of famine, in consequence of the avarice of the sovereign pontiff and his bastard, who had monopolised the corn, to carry on a scandalous traffic in it. Bands were soon formed, which infested the highways, robbed travellers, carried off convoys, and made incursions up to the gates of the holy city. The unfortunate, whom hunger and despair had urged on to crime, were abetted by some powerful lords, who hated the tyranny of Gregory, and gave an asylum in their palaces to the banditti. As soon as his holiness was apprised of this, he ordered his provost to make minute examinations in all the residences in the environs of Rome, and particularly in the palace of Raymond des Ursini, who had been denounced to him. The sbirri of the pontiff executed the orders they had received, and arrested several inoffensive persons whom they found in the residence of Raymond des Ursini. As they were about to bind them to conduct them to the castle of San Angelo, the master of the palace arrived with some of his people; he entreated the provost to set at liberty his prisoners, who were illegally arrested in a palace which enjoyed the right of asylum. The latter replied, insolently, that no consideration would prevent him from executing the orders of the pope, against such miscreants as him and his friends. This insult exasperated Raymond; he seized the arm of the provost, and struck him with a small stick he held in his hand; his sbirri immediately fired, killed this lord, and wounded five of his people. This act of hateful brutality excited a violent sedition at Rome; the people ran to arms, and threatened to besiege the Vatican, unless Gregory beheaded at once the provost and soldiers, who had assassinated Raymond des Ursini.

Gregory, cowardly as are all despots, had the sbirri who had executed his orders seized and shot, to save his own life. The provost, who had escaped, having been arrested, was beheaded. But as the real criminal was not reached, the brother of Raymond excited a new sedition, attacked the palace of Vincent Vitelli, the grandson of the pope, and son of James Buoncompagno, and slew him with his own hand. He then left Rome with a crowd of discontented persons, organised them into free companies, and made incursions at their head upon the territories of the church, and exercised cruel reprisals to avenge his family. The disquiet which this partizan war caused the pontiff, did not prevent him from pursuing his projects on the Low Countries, in which, whilst appearing to sustain the interests of Philip, he was secretly favouring the duke of Anjou. The money required to pay the French troops beginning to fail him, he determined to finish the war at a blow, and to have the duke of Orleans, the most formidable of the enemies of the Holy See, assassinated. At his instigation, the Jesuits armed a fanatic, named Jaregué, who was born in Biscay; and one day, when the prince was leaving his hotel, he shot a pistol at him, which fortunately only grazed his breast. This wretch was massacred on the spot by the people. His accomplices were sought out, and among others, a Dominican named Anthony Timmermans, who had given him absolution before he made the attempt.

The duke of Anjou was at first accused of having participated in this plot; but the prince of Orange exonerated him before the states-general, and showed them that the blow had come from Rome. The consequences, however, showed that the good sense of the citizens had not been at fault, and the conspiracy of the duke of Anjou against the liberties of the United Provinces proved, that the Belgians had been properly inspired, when accusing the brother of the king of France with connection in the attempt at assassination. This worthy son of Catherine de Medicis, this felon and disloyal duke, not satisfied with having received the titles of count of Flanders and duke of Brabant, was still willing to wrest from his new country its dearest liberties, and to reduce it to despotism. Fortunately, his attempts on Antwerp were repulsed by the republicans, and the Belgians would, beyond doubt, have slain his soldiers to the last man, if the prince of Orange had not come to his aid and appeased the anger of the Belgians, by recalling to their recollection the services which the reformed in France had rendered them, and by representing to them that it was very unjust to punish the soldiers for the faults of their leaders. These remarks saved the remains of the French army from a general massacre; but the duke was none the less obliged to return to France, where he went to conceal his shame, and where he died poisoned.

His holiness, exasperated by this check, which retarded the success of his affairs in the Low Countries to an indefinite period, redoubled his efforts to organise new plots against the life of the duke of Orange, and aided by the Jesuits, he found a madman, named Gerard, who, to gain the crown of martyrdom, consented to assassinate the enemy of the pope. The attempt succeeded this time, and William of Nassau fell beneath the dagger of the fanatic Gerard, in the city of Delph. Freed from his most formidable adversary, Gregory went on to other efforts, and armed a wretch, named William Parry, of Venice, to murder Elizabeth of England. Fortunately for this princess, the satellite of the pope, on arriving in London, was indiscreet enough to impart his plan to one of his relatives who dwelt in that city; he was immediately arrested, put to the torture, and punished for high treason.

This new effort determined the queen to publish extremely severe edicts against the Catholics, and especially against the Jesuits, who were banished from the British isles, as abettors of the conspiracy, with a prohibition to re-enter them under penalty of death. Gregory, comprehending the necessity of not leaving this warlike militia to suffer beneath the blow a reverse, and the shame of an expulsion, sought to raise their courage by introducing them as the heroes of a farce which he was about to exhibit, and which had been in rehearsal for some years. He was preparing for the solemn reception of some pretended Japanese ambassadors, in imitation of the famous deputation of Abyssinian kings, which took place during the reign of Clement the Seventh, only that instead of negroes, Gregory had procured four fishermen, who had been sent to him by the Jesuits, from a small commercial establishment in Japan. They disembarked in Spain, in company with a Jesuit, who passed them off for the sons of the king and persons of the highest distinction, and had great honours rendered them by Philip the Second. He then re-embarked with them, gained the shores of Italy, and sailed up the Tiber to Rome.

As soon as the Japanese landed, a deputation of cardinals came to congratulate them, and conducted them in great pomp to an audience of Gregory. They presented three letters from the kings of Japan to his holiness, of whom they announced themselves as the representatives, and which were translated into Italian by the Jesuits. The first was subscribed, "To the adorable who holds on earth the place of the king of heaven, the greatest, the holiest pope." The second letter began thus, "Let this missive be borne to the great and holy lord, whom I adore, and who holds the place of God on earth." The third was as follows, "I offer this letter with adoration, with hands raised towards heaven, to our most holy father, the vicar of Christ! . . ." In the body of the letters, the three princes who signed them, excused themselves for not coming in person to render their homage to the successor of the apostle Peter, on the plea of their age and business; they bestowed an extravagant eulogium on the Jesuits, and besought the pope to recompense these devoted workmen, who cultivated with so much zeal the vineyard of the Lord. Gregory feigned great joy, and exclaimed, "Glory, glory to the courageous children of Jesus! Glory to the disciples of Ignatius Loyola! I have now lived long enough, since I have seen their triumph! Lord, call your servant to yourself."

No one was, however, the dupe of this gross jugglery, nor of the enthusiasm of the pontiff, and the Jesuits obtained no more consideration than before. After all, what did the holy father care for the opinion of the people? He had succeeded in rekindling the zeal of the Jesuits; he asked for no more. He commissioned them to embitter the leaguers of France against the duke of Navarre, who had become, by the death of the duke of Anjou, the nearest heir to the throne, and thanks to their efforts, the leaguers rose against Henry the Third, and proclaimed the cardinal of Bourbon as sovereign.

This prelate, seduced by the glitter of a crown, consented to become the chief of the enemies of his house, and published a manifesto, in which he declared the dukes of Lorraine and Guise, the lieutenant generals of the Catholic league, and invested with the command of the troops by the different members of the Catholic league, the pope, the emperor, the king of Spain, the princes of the house of Austria, by those of the family of Lorraine in France, by the archbishops of Cologne and Mayence, the dukes of Nemours, Nevers, Savoy, Ferrara, Cleves, and Parma, the cardinal of Vendome, the count de Vaudemont, the republics of Venice, Genoa, and Lucca, the duke of Florence, and the prince of Scotland. After which he gave the signal for the civil war and raised the standard of revolt.

Before so formidable a league Henry the Third followed the counsels of fear; and although he knew perfectly well that the leaguers were his personal enemies, he rejoined them and apologised for their conduct. He revoked the edicts made in favour of the Huguenots, compelled their ministers to leave France, and decreed that hereafter no citizen could fill public functions nor private offices unless he was a professor of the papist doctrines. He finally pushed his cowardice so far as to give strong places to the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Bourbon, as pledges for the sincerity of his protection.

The latter, having nothing more to fear from the king, commenced war on Henry of Navarre and the prince of Condé, and demanded their excommunication from Rome. Father Matthew, the courier of the league, made several journeys into Italy to obtain this bull, which was impatiently waited for in France, and to solicit a brief authorising the Guises to assassinate Henry the Third. Whilst Gregory was preparing the bill of excommunication he was to hurl against the Huguenots, he was struck with an attack of apoplexy, which carried him off on the 10th of April, 1585. His body was buried in a chapel which he had constructed in the church of St. Peter. Thus died this pope, who had given an example of every vice to the world, and who had so well pursued the work of extermination commenced by his predecessors.

SIXTUS THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1585.]

History of the cardinal of Montalto—He is chosen sovereign pontiff by the name of Sixtus the Fifth—Commencement of his reign—He excommunicates Henry of Navarre and the prince of Condé—The two princes take vengeance on the pope—Negotiations of Sir Henry Carey at Rome—policy of Sixtus towards England and Spain—The cardinal his nephew sends his portrait to Elizabeth—The pope and the Jesuits—The legation in Switzerland—Affairs of France, Spain, and England—Death of Mary Stuart—His holiness becomes dangerously sick—Intrigues of the Jesuits in Poland—His holiness excommunicates Elizabeth—Anecdotes of the amours of the pope—He betrays Spain in favour of England—Assassination of the duke and the cardinal of Guise—Sixtus excommunicates Henry the Third—Quarrels between the pope and the emperor—The pontiff and the league—Trickery of the holy father—Conduct of the pope to Henry the Fourth—Pretensions of the pope on the kingdom of Naples—He declares against the Jesuits—He is poisoned by them—Reflection concerning them.

FELIX PERETTI, cardinal of Montalto, was born on a small farm attached to a castle called the Grotto, situated in the province of la Mancha. His father, a vine dresser of a rich proprietor, had espoused a servant of his master, and had three children by her, two sons and a daughter. The young Felix saw his poor cabin suddenly invaded one day by a troop of sbirri, who came to arrest his father for having violated some game law. The repulsive aspect of these men, and their rude oaths, so alarmed him that he ran and concealed himself in an upper story. But he had scarcely concealed himself in a corner of the room, when the floor gave way beneath him, and carried him down in its fall. The sbirri, who were already leading away their prisoner, returned and drew out the poor child half dead, and having his arms and legs broken by the fall. They carried him at once to a surgeon, who took care of him from pity, and in three months restored him to his mother entirely cured.

Felix then entered the service of a farmer and kept his pigs. Michael Angus Selleri, a monk of the order of St. Francis, was accidentally passing near the Grotto on his way to Ascoli, a town of la Mancha, and met the young swineherd. The latter, perceiving the embarrassment of the good father, offered to show him the way, and even to accompany him as far as Ascoli. During the walk he talked with his young guide, questioned him about his relatives, and learned his whole family history. He was much touched by it, and regarding this fortunate rencontre as a warning from God, he determined to take Felix to his convent and present him to his superior, which he did.

He immediately clothed his protegee in the dress of a lay brother, and placed him under the charge of a very learned monk. Felix exhibited, from the first, an extreme facility in study, and a vivacity of mind beyond his years. His character felt the effects of this last faculty; for it sometimes pushed his vivacity into anger; but his irritation being as quickly calmed as raised, his young comrades called him a Will-of-the-wisp. Apart from this slight defect, Felix was remarkable for his solid qualities, amongst others for a perseverance in his studies which amounted to obstinacy: thus his progress was rapid in every science.

At the age of twenty-six he obtained the bonnet of a doctor and the title of professor. Eight years afterwards, he was distinguished as a preacher. From that time the career of the monk, Peretti de Montalto, which was the new name by which the former swineherd was known, is easily traced. He thundered against the heretics; drew the attention of the Jesuits to himself, and obtained through them the post of inquisitor at Venice. His implacable character, and the cruelty which he exercised in that city at the instigation of Pius the Fifth, who was then inspector general of the tribunals of the holy office, excited all the population. He was constrained to fly during the night in order to avoid being stoned by the people. He is stated on this occasion to have replied to one of his colleagues, who rallied him on his flight, "I have vowed to be pope at Rome; I ought not then to have suffered myself to be hung or stoned at Venice."

On his return to the holy city he attached himself to the cardinal Buoncompagno, whose high fortune he foresaw, and accompanied him to Spain. He then sought to gain the friendship of Pius the Fifth, and obtain in succession the rank of general of the Cordeliers, that of bishop of St. Agatha, and, finally, the hat of a cardinal. The reason why he obtained such high distinctions from the sanguinary Pius the Fifth, was the perfect accordance which appeared to exist between their two natures—the same conformity of opinions, the same ferocity of character, the same thirst for blood, the same ardour in theological disputes. Brother Felix Peretti de Montalto appeared to be a second part of the pope, and to have determined to make his life a counterpart of that of his master. But when he was clothed with the purple of the cardinalate, when he found it was not even in the power of the pope to raise him higher, he changed his behaviour and his habits. From being violent, he became mild and modest; from cruel and sanguinary, compassionate and merciful; finally, he appeared transformed as if by a miracle, and became an entirely different man. It was simply a serpent changing its skin, without losing any of its deceit or venom.

On the death of Pius the Fifth, the cardinal of Montalto left his palace, and retired with a few servants to a small house situated near the church of St. Maria Majora. During the whole reign of Gregory, he appeared to have no other care than that of his salvation. He stooped, played the part of an old man by false wrinkles, and by rendering his voice tremulous, so as to give him all the appearance of one who had but a short time to live. In the sessions of the sacred college he had such an air of candour and simplicity, that they nicknamed him the Ass of la Mancha. On every occasion he recalled the obligations he was under to Pius the Fifth, and his nephew, the cardinal Alexandrin, one of the most influential of the princes of the church, and added, with an air of perfect simplicity, that if he were the lord of several worlds, he would never be rich enough to show his gratitude for the benefits his protectors had conferred upon him. He did the same towards Philip the Second, and as he knew that the Spaniards dreaded more than any thing else a pope whose mind was too enlightened, he affected an absolute incapacity.

Finally, when Gregory the Thirteenth died, he had got so far as never to go out, except leaning on a stick, and his pretended infirmities had so increased, that he appeared to have reached the most extreme state of decay.—After the funeral, the cardinals, to the number of forty-two, entered the conclave; the swineherd of Montalto, who saw the hope of reaping the fruits of eighteen years of hypocrisy, took his way to the Vatican, leaning on his stick. On his entering the Vatican, it was remarked, that he walked with more difficulty than usual, and he himself asked leave to retire to his chamber, pretending that he had not strength to support himself. On the next day, the intrigues for the election of a pope commenced, and the candidates came to urge him to join their parties; but the poor Montalto contented himself with replying, that he was not in a situation to mix himself up with the things of this world, and upon some cardinals saying to him, ironically, that he must occupy himself with affairs of this world, if he should be proclaimed pope; he replied, that his head bent towards the earth, could never sustain the weight of a tiara, and that should such an honour be offered to so unworthy an individual as himself, he would be obliged to refuse it, or to lay the burthen of public business on the sacred college. They paid no more attention to him, and proceeded to redeem the engagements the cardinals had made before the election; after which faction went to work and full rein was given to ambition.

There were as many as fourteen avowed candidates. In such a conflict, in which every elector wished to be pope, it was difficult to play into each other's hands; this was precisely what Montalto had hoped for; he guarded himself well from showing any mark of ambition, any desire of being chosen by the cardinals; on the contrary, he pledged himself to serve every one, and never left his apartment, but to go to mass to the Pauline chapel, to assist at some countings of the votes. He laboured, however, none the less, by some skilful steps, to increase the division in the conclave, so as to tire out the electors and lead their choice to him. He succeeded perfectly; the cardinals Alexandrin, d'Esté, and de Medicis, tired of caballing, abandoned their candidates in favour of Montalto, on condition that he would surrender the government of the church to them, which the wary cardinal agreed to do. They, duped by his jugglery, and fearful lest he should suddenly suffocate in a fit of coughing, or that his death should deprive them of the advantages promised them, hastened to rally their partizans to secure the election of the Ass of la Mancha.—The cardinal of Montalto dragged himself by the aid of his cane into the Pauline chapel, and voted like the rest; then, when the ballot was over, they proceeded to count the votes. Then took place a strange scene, which no one expected, and which caused alarm in the conclave. As soon as Montalto found two-thirds of the votes were for him, he stood bolt upright, and throwing his cane into the midst of the assembly, he expectorated from a full breast like a young man of thirty. The cardinals, confounded, looked at each other anxiously, and especially Medicis and Alexandrin. As the dean perceived that the cardinals repented having done their work so quickly, he exclaimed, "Do not press on us, my brethren, there is an error in the ballot." No, replied Montalto, in a firm tone, "the thing is done and in due form." And this same man, who an hour before, could scarcely speak without coughing, thundered forth the Te Deum in a voice so strong and clear, that the roof of the chapel resounded; he then went to kneel, according to custom, before the altar to say his prayers. But the cardinal de Medicis, who was beside him, remarked, that he made no motion with his lips, but contented himself with looking at the crucifix placed opposite to him in the sanctuary. When he arose, one of the cardinals approached him, and congratulated him on the singular metamorphosis which had been produced in him. "I bent myself," replied Montalto, "to seek on earth the keys of Paradise; now that they are in my hands, I can look God in the face." The master of ceremonies having approached him, to ask, as was usual, if he would accept the sovereign pontificate, "I could not do better than accept that which has been already offered me," he replied, "but I will do so the more willingly, since I feel myself strong enough to govern, not the church, but the whole world," and seizing on the pontifical ornaments, he put them on, without requiring any assistance from his chamberlains, which appeared so extraordinary to the cardinal Rusticucci, that he could not help saying, "most holy father, I see that the pontificate is a sovereign remedy to restore youth and health to old sick cardinals."—"I am as well persuaded of it as you are," replied Montalto, "from my own experience." When he had finished costuming himself, he placed the tiara on his head, and was enthroned by the name of Sixtus the Fifth.

The new pontiff, in token of his joyous advent, raised four scaffolds before his palace, and instead of granting an amnesty to criminals, according to the custom usual at each election, he caused sixty of the most obstinate heretics to be hung on the day of his coronation. He showed some little benevolence for the ambassadors of Japan, not that he was ignorant of all the springs of this pitiful farce, since he would have unfolded it as smartly as the deceased pope, but because he considered it good policy to conceal all the knaveries which might injure the Holy See. He expressed great regard for these pretended princes; he allowed them to kiss his feet before the cardinals; he embraced them with tender affection, and wished them to discharge honourable functions at his coronation, that they should carry the canopy, that they should present to him water and linen for his ablutions, and should hold his stirrup to mount; he made them knights of the golden spur, gave them, himself, the sword and girdle, and caused them to be created Roman patricians by the senate and people; finally, he celebrated divine service for them only, administered the communion to them with his own hand, and gave them a splendid banquet. After this, he loaded them with presents, gave them letters for their sovereigns at a public audience, and embarked them—what happened to them at sea? It was never known. Some historians say, that his holiness had a secret audience with the Jesuit who was to accompany them on the day of their departure, and that the worthy child of Loyola, on leaving the Vatican, went to the general of his order, to repeat to him his conversation with the pope, and that the latter replied, "The farce is played; execute the will of the head of the church, and let the sea serve for their tomb."

As soon as Sixtus the Fifth was installed on the pontifical throne, he brought his sister Camilla, with her three children, to Rome. Out of the landress which she was before, he made a princess; he loaded her with caresses, gave her a palace, land, and a considerable pension, prohibiting her, however, from asking for any favour or place. On the day succeeding this reception, the statue of Morforio asked the statue of Pasquin, "why do you wear a dirty shirt?" Because, replied Pasquin, "my washerwoman has become a princess." The pope immediately caused him who had made this allusion to the former occupation of his sister, to be sought out, in order to bestow justice upon him, and published that he would give forty thousand Roman crowns to him who denounced him.

The guilty man himself claimed an audience of the pope, thinking to make a good speculation of it, and claimed the promised sum; "Count out to him forty thousand crowns," said Sixtus, addressing his treasurer; then turning towards the executioner, who was always near by, "and thou cut off his tongue and his right hand, for fear of a repetition of the offence," which was done.

A cold and implacable cruelty was the principal trait in the character of the pontiff, of which we shall see him give a thousand proofs in the various actions of his pontificate. Thus he himself announced, in full consistory, "that he had come, like Christ, to bring a sword, not peace, and that he wished his reign to be renowned as among the most vigorous." He began by deposing the judges, who, during the preceding pontificate, had shown indulgence for the fault of heresy; he then reformed the laws and ordinances which regulated the internal police of the states of the church, and issued sanguinary edicts, which placed the lives of the citizens at his mercy. Among other things, he ordered, that every adultery should be punished with death, and he made so severe an application of this decree, that it was feared lest it should end by making Rome a great desert.

A lord of Salerno, named Charles Tasca, not being a subject of the Holy See, did not think that the laws of Sixtus the Fifth could concern him, and took no pains to conceal his amours with the wife of his steward. The holy father, furious at finding that a stranger dared to brave him in his capital, ordered the governor to execute the law of adultery against the guilty; and to the remark of the latter, that the lord of Tasca and his mistress, being subjects of the king of Naples, could only be judged by the laws of their own country, he replied, "What matters that? But since you have scruples, hang the lover, the wife, and the accommodating husband, with ropes made at Naples."

Sixtus was also desirous of suppressing the disorders of his clergy, and particularly of the cardinals, who had, for a long time, abused their privilege of inviolability, by contracting debts which they never paid; an usage which had descended to their valets. He ordered that in future, no priest, bishop, or cardinal, should refuse a just satisfaction to his creditors, and to set them an example, he paid the debts which had been contracted during the pontificate of Gregory the Thirteenth. Moreover, under the pretext of putting the business of the apostolic chamber in order, he loaded the inhabitants of Rome with taxes, and displayed unusual rigour in the collection of imposts; which so much discontented the people, that a sedition was dreaded.

According to the custom of tyrants, he sought to guard against the danger which surrounded him, by a new act of arbitrary power; he prohibited the citizens from carrying arms in the city, and punished, unmercifully, those who contravened this ordinance. It is related even, that a child of sixteen years old, having been brought before his tribunal, accused of having drawn a dagger on some sbirri who insulted him, he condemned him to be hung, and as his advocate was invoking the text of the law, which prohibited the application of the penalty of death to so young a person—"Well, by virtue of my own omnipotence, I give him ten of my years," exclaimed the pope, "and let him be led to punishment."

If we regard in Sixtus the Fifth, his inflexible zeal in the maintenance of the principles of the theocratic authority, his disdain for the human species, his cold and inexorable cruelty, his boldness in the employment of violent means, we will find that he had many points of resemblance to Gregory the Seventh. If we study this pontiff in his political measures, in his diplomatic intrigues, we will see in him a man tormented by an insatiable thirst for power, wealth, and reputation; we will see him sacrificing, unceasingly, justice to vain glory, and sometimes doing great things to immortalise his name; protecting the city, and persecuting men of letters; anathematising kings, and then turning against the people; exalting the doctrines of the Jesuits, making common cause with the league, then declaring himself the enemy of the disciples of Loyola, and banishing them from the Roman states; and, finally, setting aside all shame, glorying in having been a swineherd, and then declaring himself to be the first of the princes of the earth! Strange existence, mysterious destiny, which had taken a simple swineherd to make of him, successively, a monk, an inquisitor, a cardinal, a sovereign, and more than a sovereign—a pope!

Sixtus the Fifth, after having assured tranquillity in Rome, prepared for his strife with kings, and soon showed that he spared not even Philip of Spain; thus the ambassadors of that prince having come, on the 29th day of May, to present to him the usual tribute of a purse of seven thousand crowns of gold, carried on a white hackney, as the right of vassalage for the kingdom of Naples, the pope replied to the harangue, "Your discourse is very eloquent my lords, but we do not yet see, but that our predecessors made a foolish bargain, in swopping a kingdom for a horse."

The Spanish ambassadors thought this pleasantry had a hidden meaning, and they advised Philip the Second of it, so that he might take measures to repel the efforts which the new pope was projecting on the kingdom of Naples. But it did not enter into the views of Sixtus to embroil himself so speedily with the king of Spain; France claimed his attention above all else; he took up the business in this country at the point at which Gregory the Thirteenth had left it, he declared the family of Bourbon bastard and detestable, calling the king of Navarre a relapsed heretic; as such, depriving him of all his domains, and decreeing that he was incapable, both he and his descendents for ever, from succeeding to any kingdom and sovereignty whatever, and particularly to the crown of France. His holiness also freed his subjects and vassals from the oath of obedience they had taken to him, and prohibited them, under ecclesiastical penalties, from obeying him. The same censures were applied to his cousin, the young prince of Condé, and to all the Huguenots.

Although excommunications were already in such great discredit at the close of the sixteenth century, that a bishop of Chartres wrote, that the thunders of the pope froze in crossing the Alps; still, such a demonstration, at the moment when the kingdom was on the eve of a general combustion, must necessarily increase the confusion. Thus, from all parts, arose a cry of shame, and the different civil and religious orders hastened to address requests to the court of Rome for a revocation of the bull.

Henry the Third, who was always cowardly and pusillanimous, dared not take any energetic measures against a decree derogatory to the independence of the nation and the dignity of the crown; he contented himself with prohibiting the bull from being published in France in legal form. The parliament, bolder than the king, wished to resist the mere publication of the decree as contrary to the rights of the hereditary sovereignty; but the Guises pushed it on, and the excommunication was fastened on the doors of the churches through the whole kingdom.

Henry of Navarre, unable to take vengeance on the audacity of the pope by forcible measures, sent a protest to his ambassador, Bougars, who was at Rome. This courageous Huguenot put it up in open day, in the Campo di Fiori. In this manifesto, Henry called Sixtus a traitorous felon, and heretical pope; he summoned him to appear before a free council, under penalty of being recognised as antichrist; he declared an irreconcilable war on him, to avenge the injuries done to his person and the house of France, and claimed, for this end, the assistance of truly Christian kings and republics, interested, like himself, in arresting the audacity of a swineherd, who thought of nothing less than of overthrowing all kingdoms. This energetic action caused the greatest surprise to the court of Rome. Sixtus the Fifth, in his first burst of fury, swore to punish the author of the declaration, and the rash man who had dared to placard it even on the very gates of the Vatican; then, reflection coming to calm his irritation, he admired this trait of vigour, which was so much in harmony with his own actions, and could not help saying, that he wished Henry the Third had as much courage as the king of Navarre.

In England, the news of the exaltation of Sixtus had produced a profound sensation, and Queen Elizabeth was the more surprised at the election of the cardinal of Montalto, as she heard, at the same time, that the new pontiff, who had before appeared to be humble, ignorant, simple, and a sufferer, had shown himself to be proud, severe, implacable in his justice, and of an unheard-of rigour in his executions. She immediately assembled her council to deliberate on the course to be pursued under such circumstances, and with a pope who was capable of stirring up all the Catholic princes against the new English church. It was decided to send an ambassador to Rome, to assure themselves of the disposition of Sixtus towards England, and they chose a young lord named Carey, who, in a former journey, had formed a friendship with Alexander Peretti, the nephew of the pope, who had been promoted to the cardinalate. The queen sent, by her deputy, her portrait, enriched with precious stones, to be offered by him to the cardinal nephew, as a mark of esteem, and at the same time she commended to him to spare no efforts, expense, or presents to gain the good graces of the holy father.

On his arrival in Rome, Carey was received with distinction by Alexander Peretti, and on the next day he obtained a private audience of the pontiff. Whether it was the effect of the presents which had been sent by Elizabeth, or whether it was a calculation of policy, Sixtus received the ambassador with unusual affability. He loaded him with attentions, asked him questions as to the character, inclinations, beauty, and habits of the queen. Carey replied to all his questions, and took advantage of the circumstance to show him the portrait of his sovereign. Sixtus regarded it with much attention, and, heaving a profound sigh, said to the ambassador:—

“What a noble face! What an admirable woman is your queen! Why am I not permitted to espouse her! How I curse the religious character in which I am clothed, and which prevents me from taking a wife! for I swear by the beard of Christ, that none other but Elizabeth of England should sit upon my throne; and I feel that a queen like her would bear me children worthy of us.” He then handed back the portrait to Carey, and added graciously, that he trusted his sojourn at the court of Rome would be agreeable, and that he would advise him, for the interest of her Britannic majesty, to cultivate the friendship of his nephew, the cardinal Montalto.

Carey left the audience delighted with the impression which the portrait of the queen had made on the mind of the sovereign pontiff, and judging the moment favourable to expose the intentions of his sovereign in regard to Spain, he went immediately to the palace of the cardinal nephew to confer with him; as his eminence was still at the Vatican he was obliged to await his return. The cardinal at last arrived and listened with great attention to the confidential communications of the knight; then when he had finished he replied, that his uncle approved of the plans of Queen Elizabeth, and that he had charged him to ask in his name for the exchange of the portrait of his sovereign for that of his holiness. Carey, in the excess of his joy, did as the cardinal asked him. On the same day he wrote to the queen to inform her of the success of his mission, and to urge her to hasten the conclusion of a treaty with the United Provinces, and to send a body of troops into Flanders, to dislodge the Spaniards from the strong places which they occupied. But all this was but a farce on the part of Sixtus; the English diplomatist was the dupe of the crafty pontiff; his holiness was not in the interest of England; his only intention was to urge on Elizabeth against Philip, that they might destroy each other.

Sixtus, whilst seeking to annihilate monarchies, followed a diametrically course towards republics. Thus he sharply reprimanded one of his nuncios, who had caused a protestant minister to be arrested in the territory of the Swiss, and wrote to him:—

“Have you forgotten that we sent you to Switzerland to restore peace to the cantons, and not to carry trouble there? Remember that we have instructed you to restore harmony between heretics and Catholics, and not to excite them against each other. Know that it is not our interest to act with free people as with kings. Revolutions among independent nations are always dangerous for orthodoxy and are on the contrary favourable for heretical doctrines. I recommend to you expressly to use caution and to temporise with the Swiss, who refuse to submit to our obedience. Do not imitate the frequent inapt zeal of the Jesuits, who, whilst wishing to defend our see, have frequently struck it most fatal blows."

In fact this society was beginning to discredit the Holy See very much in the opinion of the world, since it recoiled before no crime in order to assure the triumph of Catholicism. Sixtus the Fifth, who saw the abyss into which the children of Ignatius were pushing the papacy, employed all his efforts to give an entirely different direction to affairs, and to free himself from the influence of the Jesuits. But as this was not a part of the calculations of the good fathers, they sought to bring the cardinal nephew into their interests, and, thanks to their obsessions, they succeeded so well, that the latter had the daring to propose to his uncle to take a Jesuit as his confessor. Sixtus could not restrain his anger at this proposal; he reprimanded his nephew sharply, and prohibited him from ever speaking to him of these miserable knaves, adding: "It were better for the Jesuits that I should confess them, and not that they should receive my confession." Reflection and policy caused him, however, to conceal his true sentiments concerning them, and at the entreaty of his nephew, he consented even to honour their Gregorian college by his presence and to celebrate mass there. The good fathers resolved to take advantage of the occasion for the benefit of their order; and on the day appointed by his holiness for his visit, they took care to place in his way, scholars, who recited verses in honour of Gregory the Thirteenth, which so tired the pope, that he imposed silence on their orators by saying, "You think, without doubt, you are speaking to Gregory; you are mistaken; I am called Sixtus the Fifth."

After mass, the Jesuits conducted the pontiff into the dormitories and refectories, whose propriety they made him admire. When he had examined every thing, he asked to see the cellars which contained the treasures of the community. "Alas," replied the rector, "they are dry, for never was the society so poor as during the reign of your holiness." "And what have you done then with the wealth you extorted from the people of Japan and America?" replied the pope, "it has not certainly been spent in our service, for you take good care to be paid even for the smallest assassination. Go to, I see they do not calumniate you, when they accuse you of concealing the disorders of your life beneath the mask of hypocritical severity. I will soon examine into your conduct and your chest, and I will advise you not to remain under temptation, and I will make you poorer, that you may become better Christians."

This admonition was made in a severe tone; he then retired with his suite. Notwithstanding his great desire to attack the institution, the holy father dared not put in force, immediately, the reform with which he had threatened the Jesuits; he wished to proceed regularly, and appointed the cardinal Aldobrandin president of a commission charged to inquire into the abuses which had been introduced into convents every where. The members of this commission were ordered to make a detailed report as to the means to be employed to arrest the disorders of the monks, and to draw up a list of the religious communities which it was urgent to suppress, as well as that of the convents which had preserved the spirit of their constitution in all its purity. The result of this inquiry was singular enough; the commissaries declared that they could not find one monastery in Italy in which the religious were not addicted to drunkenness, idleness, sodomy, and all kinds of abominations. They reported, that in Austria they had visited one hundred and twenty-two convents of men and women, and that they had counted in the monasteries of the monks one hundred and ninety-nine prostitutes and fifty-five young boys or girls of less than twelve years old; and in the houses of the nuns, four hundred and forty-three male domestics, who were at once the servants and the lovers of the sisterhood.

They declared that in France the convents were the theatres of even still greater outrages, and they cited, among others, the monks of Aurillac. In fact, the disorders of these monks had so passed all bounds, that the syndic and consuls had complained to parliament of Charles de Senectarie, abbot of the convent of Aurillac and lord of that city; twenty-four witnesses had deposed, that the abbot Charles, his nephews, John Belveser, called Jouchières, the prothonotary of the abbey, Antony de Senectarie, abbot of St. John, his niece, Maria de Senectarie, abbess of Bois, who governed a convent of women in the same city, as well as the monks and nuns of the two houses, abandoned themselves habitually to every excess of the most horrible depravity. They proved that several monks had as many as five or six mistresses at once, either courtezans, or young girls carried off from their parents, or women suborned or ravished from their husbands; that they had, moreover, a large number of bastards, whom they also used as their minions. They proved, moreover, that the abbot, Charles de Senectarie, made sorties at the head of his monks, beat up the country to find maidens, and drove before him in open day, with blows from his cross, such as suited him, forcing them to enter his den, without the fathers or mothers being able to offer the least resistance, from fear of being assassinated by the monks. It resulted from these depositions, that the monastery of Aurillac was secularised; this was all; the parliament having declared itself incompetent to judge the accused, they being in ecclesiastical orders.

Sixtus the Fifth also made different regulations against excessive luxury in dress and equipages; he even fixed the toilet for brides, and prohibited women from wearing lace, feathers, or flowers, natural or artificial, on their bonnets, from wearing false hair and paint, from riding with bare necks, and from appearing in the street with bare arms without sleeves to their dresses. This strictness of morals did not, however, prevent him from protecting the arts and literature; thanks to his munificence, the library of the Vatican was prodigiously increased; a hospital, a masterpiece of architecture, was built to receive fifteen hundred sick; new streets were opened; the chariots of Praxitiles and Phidias were restored, the statue of St. Peter was placed on the column of Trajan at Monte Cavallo; an aqueduct of thirteen thousand paces brought water from a limpid source to the celebrated Sixtine fountain. At his command five Egyptian obelisks, which had laid on the ground for ages, and whose restoration had frightened the genius of Julius the Second and Paul the Third, rose on their bases and opposed their hieroglyphics to the mysteries of the Catholic religion; so that now the learned can read upon their pedestals an inscription engraven in the time of the Roman emperors, in honour of Cæsar, sovereign pontiff, who had brought these monuments from old Egypt, and another inscription in memory of Sixtus the Fifth, sovereign pontiff, the restorer of the obelisks.

Then, what was no less a work, he undertook to purify the text of the Old and New Testaments, which was full of gross errors. The majority of the cardinals agreed with him, and they proceeded to a first revision, in which five thousand errors were discovered, and on a second, two thousand more in dates, names, and figures were brought to light; after which, the consistory decided that the Bible thus purified was the only canonical one. Sixtus gave it the name of the Vulgate, and prohibited by a bull, any one, under penalty of the greater excommunication, from changing, adding to, or retracting a syllable from the text of the word which God had revealed to Moses; this did not, however, prevent Clement the Eighth, one of his successors, from again correcting the Old Testament some years afterwards.

Whilst the holy father was bestowing his attention on the correction of the Old Testament and the holy gospels, the civil war had broken out in France, more terribly than ever. The Guises, seeing between them and the throne, but a king enervated by debauchery, and an imbecile cardinal, redoubled their efforts to crush Henry of Navarre, the only competitor who was capable of disputing the crown of France with them. They rallied around them all the nobility of Champagne and Burgundy, whom they reinforced by Spanish troops, and declared war. Lyons, Toul, Verdun, and many other cities opened their gates to them at the instigation of the Jesuits; they then seized on Orleans, Bourges, and Angers, and finished by becoming the masters of Paris, which they made henceforth the centre of their operations. The clandestine meetings of the leaguers were transformed into actual deliberative assemblies, in which the conduct of Henry the Third and his ministers was audaciously censured. The leaders, who, from their number, were at first called the council of Sixteen, organised a new government in the state, levied imposts, established relations with the revolted provinces, and, finally, governed in the name of Catholicism and the cardinal de Bourbon.

But what was most extraordinary in this war, called that of the three Henrys, was the strange part which the holy father played. Whilst seeking to excite the parties against each other, he refused to give his approval to the league, from hatred to the Jesuits; he also blamed the fury of Henry the Third, and anathematised the king of Navarre. This strange policy is explained by his desire to see the three factions annihilate each other, and the sway of Rome be established on their ruins. He also did the same towards England, and the great esteem he affected for Queen Elizabeth, did not prevent him from entering into a conspiracy organised by the Spanish ambassador and the Jesuits, the object of which was to place the crown of England on the head of Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland, who had been Elizabeth's prisoner for eighteen years.

A numerous fleet was already collected in the ports of Spain, and only waited a signal to set sail towards the shores of Great Britain; this signal was to be sent from England on the very day of the assassination of Elizabeth. A Jesuit named Ballard, was charged with the job, and had induced a young gentleman, named Babington, of a turbulent and hasty spirit, to strike down the queen of England. It is even affirmed that Mary Stuart had several secret interviews with Babington, that she had promised him her hand, and that the latter had sallied from her arms intoxicated with love, and burning to merit so magnificent a recompense. But the plot was discovered on the eve of the day fixed for its execution; all the conspirators were seized, put to the torture, and obliged to confess their crime. Elizabeth pardoned none of the guilty, and the head of Mary Stuart rolled beneath the axe of the executioner. Such was the result of the new plot, contrived by Sixtus the Fifth and Philip the Second; neither of them was moved by the death of the queen of Scotland. Leti even maintains, that his holiness, after having listened to a circumstantial account of this mournful tragedy, exclaimed, "I envy thy lot Elizabeth! thou art judged worthy by God to see a crowned head roll at thy feet, whilst I have only been permitted as yet to shed the blood of miserable lords, or poor poets." He did not, however, turn the less towards Spain to excite Philip to take a brilliant vengeance for the death of Mary of Scotland.

Philip, who was interested in making war on the English, promised to conform to the desires of his holiness, as soon as the pope should have given a cardinal's hat to William Alleyn, a traitor, who had sold himself to Spain, and as soon as he should be furnished from the apostolic treasury with the assistance in money of a million of Roman crowns. Six-

Si
v-235
Pon
15

ius hastened to send a message to Alleyn to come and receive from his hand the hat of a cardinal, with the title of St. Martin of the Mount. He, moreover, appointed him his legate a latere, and immediately after the ceremonies sent him as his legate to Spain, to hurry the armaments against England. At the same time, he instructed him to hand to the king a secret treaty, in which he entered into an obligation to pay a million of crowns as soon as the Spaniards were in possession of a single city in England, and still more, to levy extraordinary dimes in his states, except the kingdom of Naples, of which his holiness coveted the possession. Philip agreed to the proposals of the pope, doubled the number of ships which he had for a long time collected, increased the number of troops to be embarked in them, by more than fifty thousand men, and openly announced that he destined this fleet, which he surnamed the Invincible, for the conquest of England, and which was in fact, the most formidable one that had yet covered the ocean. He did not, however, wish to attack Elizabeth definitely, until he had placed the court of Rome in such a position, that it was impossible for it to betray him and go over to his enemies, and he exacted that the pope should solemnly excommunicate the queen of England. Sixtus, who was anxious to bring these two great powers to blows, so that by the assistance of their dissensions he might seize on the kingdom of Naples, gave to the prince the satisfaction he required, and fulminated in full consistory, all the cardinals being assembled, the following bull:

"We, Sixtus the Fifth, the universal shepherd of the flock of Christ, the supreme chief, to whom the government of the whole world appertains, considering that the people of England and Ireland, after having been so long celebrated for their virtues, their religion, and their submission to our see, have become putrid members, infected, and capable of corrupting the whole Christian body, and that on account of their subjection to the impious, tyrannical, and sanguinary government of Elizabeth, the bastard queen, and by the influence of her adherents, who equal her in wickedness, and who refuse, like her, to recognise the authority of the Roman church; regarding that Henry the Eighth formerly, for motives of debauchery, commenced all these disorders by revolting against the submission which he owed to the pope, the sole and true sovereign of England; considering that the usurper Elizabeth has followed the path of this infamous king, we declare that there exists but one mode of remedying these evils, of restoring peace, tranquillity, and union to Christendom, of re-establishing religion, and of leading back the people to obedience to us, which is, to depose from the throne that execrable Elizabeth, who falsely arrogates to herself the title of queen of the British isles. Being then inspired by the Holy Spirit for the general good of the church, we renew, by virtue of our apostolic power, the sentence pronounced by our predecessors, Pius the Fifth and Gregory the Thirteenth, against this modern Jezebel; we proclaim her deprived of royal authority, of the rights, titles, or pretensions to which she may lay claim over the kingdoms of Ireland and England, affirming that she possesses them unlawfully and by usurpation. We relieve all her subjects from the oaths they may have taken to her, and we prohibit them from rendering any kind of service to this execrable woman; it is our will, that she be driven from door to door like one possessed of a devil, and that all human aid should be refused her; we declare, moreover, that foreigners or Englishmen are permitted, as a meritorious work, to seize the person of Elizabeth and surrender her, living or dead, to the tribunals of the inquisition. We promise to those who shall accomplish this glorious mission, infinite recompenses, not only in the life eternal, but even in this world. Finally, we grant plenary indulgences to the faithful, who shall willingly unite with the Catholic army, which is going to combat the impious Elizabeth, under the orders of our dear son Philip the Second, to whom we give the British isles in full sovereignty, as a recompense for the zeal he has always shown towards our see, and for the particular affection he has shown for the Catholics of the Low Countries."

This terrible bull was published in the ecclesiastical states, with tolling of bells, and by the light of candles. At Madrid they dressed the chapel of the palace of the Escorial in black, and Philip, dressed in black, and followed by all the grandees of his court, caused the anathema pronounced against the queen of England, to be read by the nuncio.

After such a manifestation in favour of the king of Spain, it would appear as if the pope was most seriously desirous of securing the crown of England for Philip, and Carey, mortified at having been the dupe of the apostolic court, was preparing to leave Rome to return to England, when he was sent for to a private audience at the Vatican. Sixtus delivered a long discourse on the necessity under which sovereigns were, of disguising their thoughts, and acting contrary to their sentiments. He renewed his protestations of friendship for Elizabeth, and told him to write to the queen to place herself in a state of defence against the attacks of Philip, adding that after having excited the Spanish wasp, by putting the Scotch prostitute to death, she ought, from prudence, to guard against being stung, or perhaps killed. He complained that his title of pope compelled him to take part with Philip, whom he mortally hated, and that he was desirous of treating him, as she had treated Mary Stuart; he affirmed to her that the succours he had promised, were in reality illusory, since they were reduced to the gift of a red hat to a stupid lord, and a ridiculous excommunication, which the queen could readily return in her capacity as popess; and as for the million of crowns, he was only bound to furnish them six months after the capture of some considerable place in England, which the queen could certainly prevent.

Pius Quintus.

The conference having terminated, he sent to Carey a very circumstantial note as to the plans of Philip, the state of his army, the character of his generals, and the cause of the expedition; he recommended to him to transmit it immediately to his sovereign, and to recommend to her to strike a sudden blow on the Low Countries, in which symptoms of revolt were manifesting, whilst Spain was solely occupied with arming against Great Britain.

By the advice of Carey, the queen assembled her vessels, made them cruise on the coasts, and placed all her ports in good condition; then, following the example of the holy father, she convened the principal lords of her court, the magistrates and notables of her kingdom, as well as the heads of the clergy, in the church of St. Paul, and in the presence of an immense crowd, as the supreme head of the English church, she fulminated a terrible excommunication against Pope Sixtus the Fifth, his cardinals, officers, and generally against all those who had signed the bull of forfeiture. After this, she had eight tables magnificently served, set out in her palace, and presided over a banquet, at which numerous toasts were given in her honour, and to the destruction of the enemies of her crown.

Leti maintains that the esteem which the pope exhibited for Elizabeth, was inspired in him by Anne Austin, a young English woman of remarkable beauty, whom Carey had presented to his holiness, and who enjoyed the singular privilege of entering his private apartments at all hours of the day or night, "a scandal which alarmed the susceptibility of the Spanish ambassadors and cardinals," adds the historian, "and which compelled the pontiff to lodge his mistress in the palace of Donna Camilla, and to make a procuress of his sister." As it was remarked that his holiness then paid frequent visits to his sister in disguise, the statues of Marforio and Pasquin apprised the faithful that the popess Anne Austin was so devoted to England, that no night passed, without her conferring with the pope, or the cardinal Montalto, his nephew, on the mode of restoring this fine country to the bosom of the church.

Events advanced the policy of Sixtus in regard to Spain; the fleet, surnamed the Invincible, was almost totally destroyed by a frightful tempest, which assailed it at the mouth of the Thames. The vessels which escaped the violence of the sea, were routed by Francis Drake, the vice admiral of England, and obliged to return in disgrace to Spain. This news caused such joy to the pope, that he could scarcely restrain an exclamation which betrayed his secret thoughts, and as the cardinal Montalto entered his chamber, whilst Carey was reading to him the despatches which related to this event, he exclaimed, "Rejoice, my nephew, the kingdom of Naples is ours."

In France, strange things were occurring; the religious war raged as furiously as ever between the Catholics and protestants. Henry the Third, become the head of the league, and the slave of the court of Rome, did not cease murdering his subjects. The duke of Guise, the soul of the league, was unceasingly organising new plots now against Henry of Navarre, now against the king of France, and by means of his baseness had obtained from the holy father the title of the Second Maccabeus, and the gift of a blessed sword. The Jesuits, though execrated by Sixtus, were struggling to merit his thanks by increasing the disorders; they first poisoned the young prince Henry of Condé, by means of Charlotte de la Trémouille, his own wife; they then formed a conspiracy against Henry the Third himself, resolved to seize on his person, and force him to place the government of his kingdom in the hands of the duke of Guise. Unfortunately for the latter, the conspiracy was discovered. The Sixteen, who feared a return of energy on the part of the king, hastened to send an express to the duke to join them, and concert measures, in order to escape from the danger in which they were.

The duke of Guise immediately left the city of Nancy, and hastened to Paris, notwithstanding the prohibition of Henry the Third. It is true that he presented himself without any suite, and accompanied by only seven officers of his household; but scarcely had he passed through the gates of the capital, than an immense concourse of more than thirty thousand persons surrounded him, and accompanied him with cries of "Life to Guise." "Never," says d'Aubigné, "was any king received with such testimonials of joy; some heaped blessings upon him, and called him their liberator; others bent the knee before him, kissing the hem of his garments, and touching their rosaries to his doublet, as if contact with it could sanctify them; those who could not reach him, raised their hands in supplication, and called him their divinity; females and children cast flowers from every window, and made the air resound with their acclamations. The duke advanced in the midst of this crowd at the slowest pace of his horse, with his head uncovered, addressing gracious words to the nearest, saluting with a smile the ladies who were at the windows, and replying to every one by a look or a gesture. His escort conducted him to the hotel de Soissons, where the execrable Catherine de Medicis resided."

The queen mother was somewhat alarmed at this popular manifestation, but she did not suffer the least sign of terror to appear; on the contrary, she received the duke with marks of the most lively satisfaction, and offered to conduct him to the king. Guise accepted the offer, and they immediately started for the Louvre, the queen in her chaise, and the duke on foot. It was remarked that he never stopped talking to Catherine during the route, which separated the hotel de Soissons from the residence of the king, until the moment they entered the apartment of Henry. The latter, following the example of his mother, concealed in the bottom of his heart the resentment he felt; he contented himself with addressing feeble remonstrances to the duke on his disobedience, and dismissed him, which caused Sixtus the Fifth to say: "He did not know which was the greatest fool, the duke of Guise, who had the boldness to place himself in the hands of an irritated prince, or Henry the Third, who, having his revenge in his hands, allowed it to escape."

The king and the duke were, however, both playing their parts; and, as soon as they separated, each sought the means of ridding himself of the other, without danger to himself. Henry called his nobility to Paris, armed the burghers who were devoted to him, brought up from Laguy four thousand Swiss, who were stationed there, doubled the posts of the city, and in a few days found himself in a condition to attack the duke of Guise. But the latter had, in his turn, taken his precautions; on the very morning of the day on which he was to have been seized by the royal troops, he had armed the people; so that, as soon as the soldiers were in motion, the tocsin was sounded, chains stretched, barricades formed with boards, joists, or hogsheads filled with earth or dung; the pavements were torn up, and the windows furnished with paving stones. In less than four hours, communications between the different parts of the capital were interrupted, and the combat commenced between the citizens and the king's troops. The latter, finding themselves taken, as it were, in an immense net, unable to advance or fall back, sought to retreat by getting behind walls, so as to protect themselves from the shots from guns, and the stones which were rained down on them from the windows and house tops. In vain did they show their rosaries, and exclaim, with all their might, that they were good Catholics. The Jesuits, who had mingled among the leaguers to excite them to carnage, replied to their exclamations with cries of death, and certainly none would have escaped the massacre but for the interference of the duke of Guise. The chief of the leaguers approached the troops, made them lay down their arms, and ordered the count de Saint Pol to accompany them beyond the gates of Paris; then, when evening came, he established a regular guard around the Louvre, in order to prevent any escape during the night. But Henry the Third, who feared, with reason, lest the place should be carried by assault, seized on the moment when the rear of the castle had not yet been invested, to escape across the garden of the Tuilleries. He gained the monastery of the Feuillants, and escaped from thence towards Chartres, accompanied by not more than thirty gentlemen; the rest of the court followed the prince in the greatest disorder, and the troops did not rejoin him until the evening of the second day.

Guise having missed the king, was engaged in assuring to himself the possession of Paris; he seized on the bastille, Vincennes, the temple, and the two chatelets, and installed every where his own garrisons, and governors selected from among his most devoted creatures. Quiet was at once restored, and on the day after this revolt, called the day of the barricades, it could have been affirmed that there had not been any troubles in Paris, so much had matters resumed their usual course. This was not what the Jesuits desired, who, in reality, did not favour one party more than the other. What these good fathers wished was a civil war, which would enable them to subject France to the court of Rome. They then endeavoured to stop the progress of this revolution, and sought to ruin the power of the duke of Guise, by publishing that the holy father disapproved of the revolt of the leaguers against their lawful chief, and by threatening the Parisians with frightful evils, if they remained longer without the king. As the clergy still exercised a great influence over their minds, these threats alarmed the rebels, and determined them to recall Henry the Third among them. A deputation of burghers went to the convent of the young count du Bouchage, one of the favourite minions of the king, who had made him a Capuchin, to beseech him, in the name of the kingdom's safety, to act as mediator between them and the sovereign, in order to solicit their pardon, and obtain his consent to return to his good city of Paris. The young monk lent himself graciously to all they wished, and started for Chartres, accompanied by the Jesuits Pigeat and Commolet, who had imagined a singular scene to touch the heart of the monarch.

At a mile from Chartres the train of the count du Bouchage alighted, made the rest of the journey in the following order: the young Capuchin, naked, headed the procession, dragging a huge cross of painted pasteboard, and wearing a crown of thorns on his head; by his side walked two young boys of remarkable beauty, almost naked, representing the Virgin and St. Madeline; behind them came a crowd of monks in the costume of the personages of the passion. This strange cortege arranged its march so as to arrive at the cathedral whilst Henry was at vespers. On entering the church, all the Capuchins thundered out the Miserere, in a lamentable tone, and two monks, disguised as executioners, detached themselves from the group, rushed upon the former minion of the king, struck him blows of discipline, and obliged him to come and cast himself at the feet of Henry the Third to implore his mercy. The marshal Borin, who was at the side of the king, indignant that they should play such a farce, wished to have all who composed the deputation arrested, but Henry prevented him.

His majesty had already seen the two handsome youths who figured in the procession as the Virgin and St. Madeline; he listened favourably to the pleadings of the monks, and promised to receive the Parisians into favour; he then dismissed all except the count du Bouchage, and his two acolytes, whom he made his minions.

Henry the Third then left Chartres, and went to Rouen, to receive a deputation from the members of parliament; after these came the municipal officers, the trades, the provosts of the merchants, and the professors of the university. During more than a month the road was constantly furrowed by couriers and delegates going from Paris to Rouen, or from Rouen to Paris, to offer, or report proposals for an arrangement. Finally, whether the king meditated treason, or was really tired of the war, he showed himself very accommodating, offered to make peace with his enemy, and even published a new edict of union, which was a repetition of preceding treaties, by which his majesty erected the holy league into an institution. Henry, moreover, pledged himself to declare a war of extermination against the Huguenots, without truce or mercy; not to lay down his crown, until after having exterminated them to the last man; to exclude the king of Navarre from the throne of France; to appoint the duke of Guise generalissimo of his armies, and to give to the leaguers hostages and places which they should judge useful for their safety; moreover, and under pretext of adding solemnity to his engagements, he convened the states-general at Blois.

So many concessions exalted the pride of the duke of Guise, and gave him such an idea of his power, that he neglected the care of his own safety. This was precisely what Henry the Third, the worthy son of Catherine de Medicis, waited for. Guise, believing that he had only to stretch out his arm to seize the crown, preserved no respect towards the king, and even encouraged the imprudent vaunt of the duchess of Montpensier, his sister, who affected to carry by her side golden scissors, which she intended to use, she said, to make a monkish tonsure for the last of the Valois. The cardinal of Guise, in imitation of his brother, did not fear, at a session of the states, to pass a severe criticism on the government of the king, and to call the attention of the nation to the abuses of royalty. Henry the Third devoured all these affronts in silence, and let no sign of anger, no mark of irritation escape him. In the opinion of the vulgar, such conduct was the height of cowardice; in that of those who were initiated in the policy of courts, it was a proof that the prince was meditating a terrible vengeance. Some one of the partizans of the duke of Guise slipped an anonymous note beneath his plate, to urge him to be careful of his life. He read it, and wrote in lead pencil, "no one will dare attempt it." He then cast it under the table.

Some days afterwards, he went as usual to the council. As soon as he entered the castle, he remarked, that the doors were at once closed behind him, and what surprised him the more was, to see the guard reinforced, and a hundred Swiss ranged in line of battle upon the stairs; he, however, put a good face upon it, and went to take his place among the great dignitaries of the court. He had been there scarcely five minutes, when a page came to ask him to follow him to the king. He immediately rose and crossed the gallery which separated the council chamber from the cabinet of the king, with rapid steps; but as he was raising the drapery which concealed the entrance, one of the officers of Henry the Third, named Saint Malines, seized him by the throat and struck him a blow of his dagger from the upper part of the breast downwards. Guise uttered but one cry and fell dead, which did not, however, prevent forty-five assassins from rushing upon his dead body, which they ran through with their swords in the presence of the king.

The cardinal of Guise, who had heard the cry of his brother, rose from his seat in the greatest trouble, saying, "Lo, they have killed my brother," and endeavoured to escape.—The marshals d'Aumont and de Retz arrested him at once in the name of the king, and conducted him to a garret, which served as his prison, and where he was stabbed by four soldiers, who had received four hundred crowns from his majesty to commit this murder.—The bodies of the two Guises were buried in quick lime, and their bones burned in one of the saloons of the castle of Blois, from fear lest the people should take a fancy to venerate them as the relics of holy martyrs.

These bloody executions over, Henry resumed the measures of an insolent despot, dissolved the states-general, and publicly announced that he was king, and knew how to make himself feared. He first sought to enter into an arrangement with the Parisians, and sent deputies to them to treat concerning their submission. But the soul of his councils was wanting; the terrible Catherine de Medicis was dead, and carried with her to the tomb, the secret of those Machiavelian plans, which had assured the triumph of her family over their enemies.

The leaguers would not listen to any proposals; they drove away the envoys of the king, and threatened to hang them if they dared to re-appear in the capital. We should say, that this city was then the theatre of deplorable scenes, in consequence of the religious exaltation which the Jesuits had excited. It was from Paris, from the bosom of the colleges of the disciples of Loyola, that went forth by bands, a crowd of satellites, breathing hatred, discord, and civil war, even to the extremities of the kingdom; it was in the capital, in their dwelling, in the street of St. Antoine, that the council of the league held its sessions; it was in this abominable house, and in the college of the street of St. Jacques, that these cabals were held, in which were elaborated all the plans of murder and poisoning, which were to be used in the triumph of the papacy, or rather in that of the Jesuits, who saw, close by, the subjugation of the whole universe to their order.

The Sorbonne assembled, and decreed, under the promptings of these wretches, that the French were freed from the oath of fidelity they had sworn to Henry the Third, and that they ought to draw the sword against him and his, in the defence of the Catholic religion. In all the provinces, priests and monks excommunicated the last of the Valois, and broke his arms and statues, even in the churches. Finally, the duke of Mayenne, the brother of the unfortunate Guises, was declared lieutenant general of the kingdom, and invested by the council of Sixteen, with the sovereign power.

Whilst the Jesuits were exciting the people against Henry the Third, he was despatching ambassadors into Italy, with rich presents, to obtain from his holiness a disapproval of the conduct of the Jesuits, and an order for the dissolution of the holy league. But diligent as were the deputies of the king in their passage from Blois to Rome, they were outstripped by the Jesuits; and when John de Vivonne, marquis of Pisani, and the lord of Gondy, presented themselves at the Vatican, they found Sixtus informed of all they came to teach him. His holiness received them with an air of inexpressible hauteur, and interrupted them as soon as they commenced speaking, and reprimanded them for daring to justify their master for a crime committed in defiance of divine and human laws, on the person of a prince of the church.

"Your sodomite wren, is very bold," he exclaimed, in a paroxysm of rage, "in daring to lay his sacrilegious hand on our cardinals!—Does he think we are yet a keeper of pigs, and that like a stupid swineherd, we will see our herd murdered, merely shedding powerless tears? No, no, by God, he shall learn that we are the worthy successor of the apostle, the vicar of Christ, the ruler of the world, the supreme pontiff. He shall learn that we know how to avenge the honour of our church, and that the head of a cardinal is more precious than the heads of twenty kings."

The marquis of Pisani could not restrain his indignation, and replied, "What, holy father, has not the king, my master, liberty to rid himself of the cardinal de Guise, his mortal foe, since Pius the Fourth, your predecessor, caused the cardinal Caraffa, who was his friend, to be strangled of his own private authority?" This reply increased the fury of the pope; he threatened to accumulate the most frightful ills on France; he declared that he would crush with his thunderbolts, the assassins of the Guises, and notwithstanding the representations and the reiterated entreaties of Gondy, Pisani, and Claude Daguennes, bishop of Mans, the king was excommunicated.

From that moment, the clamours of the league redoubled in France; a Jesuit named Boucher, preached from the pulpit of St. Genevieve, that Henry the Third was a Turk in his head, a German in his body, a harpy in his hands, an Englishman in his garters, a Pole in his feet, a true Lucifer in his soul, adding, that Christians should knock him in the head like a mad dog. "And the king being thus, by the sentence of a priest, condemned to death," says the Journal of l'Estoile, "wax figures were made of him, which these wretches stretched out on the altar for forty consecutive hours, and which they pierced with their poniards, during the celebration of divine service, in different parts of the body, especially in the temples, the heart, and the navel, pronouncing, at each blow, magical words, which they supposed to have the virtue of putting the king to death." The leaguers then advanced in arms to seize on Henry the Third, who was still at Tours.

In this extremity, the king found he had nothing left him but to throw himself into the arms of the king of Navarre, the leader of the Calvinists, and his old companion in debaucheries; by this junction, he was enabled to resume the offensive and drive back the troops of the duke of Mayenne, whom he pursued up to the gates of Paris.

The royal army, more than forty thousand strong, then encamped beneath the walls of the capital, besieged it, and cut off all communication with the country, so that it was impossible for the leaguers, placed between a starving population and veteran troops, to be able to continue the strife; but a resource, which they never hesitated to use, remained to the Jesuits, that of crime. The roofs of the churches resounded with furious declamations against Henry the Third, and a thousand voices called down all the vengeance of heaven and earth upon him. This profusion of curses produced the effect they anticipated. A young Jacobin, named Jacques Clement, exalted by their preaching, formed a plan to free the earth from this heretical king, whom the priests signalled out to the vengeance of men, and went to Father Bourgoyne, his superior, to unbosom himself; the latter immediately informed the Sixteen, the dukes of Mayenne and Anmale, as well as the dutchess of Montpensier, the fury of the league, of it; he recommended Jacques Clement to them as a man endowed with a savage energy, an ardent and unquiet mind, an ill-regulated imagination, of infamous morals, and possessing all the necessary qualities to insure the success of this difficult enterprise. He recommended him especially to Madame Montpensier, and begged her to try the power of her charms over the young Dominican. That same night, this Messalina sent for Jacques Clement to her palace, prostituted herself to him, and determined him to kill the king.

The Jesuits did not remain behind the dutchess, and seconded her so marvellously, by promising the Jacobin, in the name of the pope, to create him a cardinal if he succeeded, or to place him among the saints if he perished; the duke of Mayenne was then engaged about the mode of procuring for him an audience of Henry the Third. The chief of the league went to the bastille to find Achilles du Harlay and the count de Brienne, who were his prisoners, under the pretext of obtaining their good offices, and their intercession with the king, in order to enter into arrangements to terminate the war. He thus obtained letters for Henry the Third, and a passport, which he hastened to carry to his sister. The latter brought the monk to her palace, and after a night of debauchery, in which she enervated him by the most burning caresses, she gave him the despatches intended for Henry the Third, and a poisoned knife.

Clement left Paris on the 31st of July, 1589, and went towards the royal camp; the advanced guard arrested him and led him before Jacques la Guesle, the attorney general, who was then at St. Cloud. He replied, unconcernedly to this magistrate, that he had letters for the king, which he could not deliver but to him. He was led immediately to Henry the Third, to whom he presented the letters of which he was the bearer, announcing that he was charged, besides, with an extremely important verbal message. His majesty immediately commanded his courtiers to retire, and remained alone with the Jacobin.

A few minutes afterwards, the king called for aid, crying out that he was assassinated, and whilst his guards were running in at his cry, he drew out the knife which Clement had plunged into his belly, and struck him with it in the face; the monk was killed on the spot by the guards. Some days afterwards, his body was dragged on a hurdle drawn by four horses, and burned before the church of St. Cloud. The king was mortally wounded, and died on the next day, appointing as his successor, Henry of Navarre, who took the name of Henry the Fourth.

This murder of the last descendent of the Valois, filled the Parisians with a joy which approached delirium. All, men and women, traversed the streets, exclaiming, "Huzza for St. Clement the martyr;" and the Dominicans, Capuchins, and Jesuits, demanded from their pulpits, that they should immolate the prisoners of the league to the manes of the regicide. Finally, the leaguers pushed their fanaticism so far as to place his portrait over the high altar, with this inscription written by the Jesuit Commolet:

"A young Jacobin, named Jacques Clement, presents a letter to Henry of Valois, in the burg of St. Cloud, and virtuously plants a well-sharpened knife in his stomach."

The clergy of Notre Dame even decided to raise a marble statue to the assassin, which should be exposed on the principal altar for the adoration of the faithful. Finally, says the abbot of Longuerne, the Sorbonne decreed that his canonization should be solicited at Rome, and the request was at once addressed to the sovereign pontiff.

Sixtus the Fifth, on hearing the news of the death of Henry the Third, allowed transports of indecent joy to escape him, and exclaimed, "Very well, the college of princes is delivered from a rot, and the kingdom of France is on fire." He then convened his cardinals in consistory, announced to them officially, the assassination of the king of France, eulogised Jacques Clement, whom he elevated above Judith and Eleazar, and prohibited them from celebrating for Henry the Third, the prayers which the church employed on the death of a sovereign. He then sent the cardinal Gaëtan to Paris, to increase the disorders in that kingdom, and to proclaim the cardinal of Bourbon king, by the name of Charles the Tenth, which took place. From that time the leaguers appeared to have redoubled their fury; Fathers Pigenat and Commolet no longer took any pains to conceal their plans of annihilating royalty; they preached regicide openly and daily; asked, in their sermons, for a man of courage and devotion who would free France from Henry of Navarre, whom they called a bastard, a heretic, an excommunicated, a relapsed person. On her side, the dutchess of Montpensier abandoned herself to the most disgusting debaucheries with vulgar assassins and cut purses, in order to find a new Jacques Clement. Whilst murder, ambition, fanaticism, and licentiousness were covering the soil of France, and paving the way for its subjection to the Holy See, Sixtus was exciting bloody collisions between England and Spain, and was urging the Catholic bishops of Germany to free themselves from the jurisdiction which Rodolph the Second wished to exercise over the clergy of his kingdom.

The latter protested, through his organ, the duke of Savelli, his ambassador at Rome, against the efforts of the agents of the pope; it was replied to him, that he had no right to make any complaint; that he ought to know that if fortune had placed the sword in the hands of the first emperors, their successors had not carried it for many years, except at the good pleasure of the popes, in order to maintain the interests of the Holy See, and not to destroy the immunities of the church; that the vicars of Christ held their authority from God alone, and that they would never suffer sovereigns to take cognizance of the affairs of the church, nor that the ministers of the altar should be lifted up by temporal princes. Savelli, availing himself skilfully of the opportunity, replied to the argument, that it was just that the emperor should not interfere in spiritual things, for the same reason that his holiness should not take part in temporal matters, and that he claimed, in the name of his master, the right of appointing the prefect of Rome, as the kings of the Romans have always done, previous to the pontificate of Sixtus the Fourth, one of his predecessors.

The pope, irritated at having been conquered by his own arms, exclaimed in anger, "Your master is king of the Romans in Germany, I admit; but he has no authority in Rome, because I am the sole lawful sovereign of it. Formerly, the popes followed rules and maxims, which it is no longer convenient for them to practise; I am emperor at Rome; the city belongs to me; I have a right to appoint magistrates, and I have determined to defend the justice of my cause against all who may pretend to command as masters in my states. The church orders, to render to God that which belongs to God, and to Cæsar that which belongs to Cæsar; now as the whole world belongs to God and his vicar, Cæsar has no right to possess but that which it pleases the popes to give him."

This discourse being reported to the emperor, convinced him that the ambition of Sixtus was insatiable, and that he dreamed of nothing but erecting the papacy into an universal dictatorship; he, consequently, sought the alliance of Spain, and made a treaty with Philip the Second, to oppose the ulterior plans of the pontiff, and to divide between them the kingdom of France, which appeared exhausted by religious wars, wars which threatened to be interminable, in consequence of the death of the cardinal de Bourbon, surnamed the King of the League, who had died in his prison at Fontenay in Poitou, where Henry the Fourth kept him. Independently of the king of Navarre, four other pretenders disputed the throne. The duke of Mayenne, who was already the depositary of supreme authority, as the lieutenant of the kingdom; the young duke of Guise, under whose name the duchess of Montpensier, his aunt, hoped to reign as Catherine de Medicis had done under Charles the Ninth; the duke of Lorraine, the head of the family, who maintained that he had more right to the crown than the younger branch, since he had espoused the princess Claude, the sister of the late king. Finally, the king of Spain, who had also married a sister of Henry the Third, and who counted on his doubloons and the promise he had made to the principal leaguers, to triumph over his rivals, the princes of Lorraine.

In the midst of this conflict of interests so diverse, and of ambitions so opposed, the cardinal Gaëtan took the side of the richest, and on receiving considerable sums, he abandoned the cause of the pope, and carried over the Jesuits to the party of the king of Spain. The disciples of Ignatius Loyola changed their banners the more readily, since they had discovered that Sixtus the Fifth, with his imperious character, would never consent to become the instrument of their plans for universal sway. They then sold themselves to Philip, and the fathers Aubray, Pigenat, and Commolet laboured so well for his interests, that the Sixteen put to death three magistrates, named Brisson, Larcher, and Tardif, who wished to oppose the substitution of the tyranny of the king of Spain for that of their ancient kings. The cardinal de Gondy, bishop of Paris, was obliged to escape to avoid a like treatment, and the duke of Mayenne would doubtless have become their victim, had he not determined to hang four of these mad leaguers, in order to intimidate the Jesuits.

The affairs of Henry the Fourth were taking an extremely favourable turn; his authority was already recognised in a large number of cities in the provinces; several victories, gained over the troops of the league, gave more importance to his party daily; his military courage won hearts for him; finally, he had progressed so wonderfully in his affairs, that after the battles of Arques, he was in a position to lay siege to Paris.

Sixtus the Fifth, seeing that the league was in distress, and that, moreover, he could not hope for any thing from it favourable to his interests, since the Jesuits were sold to Spain, declared openly against it. Philip the Second, to revenge this defection, declared that the pope was not a Catholic, since he abandoned the cause of religion; he accused him of having for a long time favoured the party of the queen of England, and of having even thought of protecting Henry of Navarre, the Huguenot. He spread abroad, profusely, violent writings against him, and ordered Duke Olivarez, his ambassador at Rome, to summon him to keep his engagements with him, in regard to the holy league, and in case of refusal, he enjoined on the duke to protest publicly against his holiness, and to declare him a heretic in full consistory. Olivarez went to the Vatican to obey the orders of his sovereign, and addressed energetic representations to the pontiff on the perfidy of his conduct towards Spain. Sixtus appeared to listen to him with great attention, and as he did not hasten to reply, the ambassador added, "Will your holiness speak and tell me of what you are thinking?"—"Yes," replied the pope, "since you are so curious to know my thoughts, I will tell you; I was thinking of having you thrown out of the window, to teach you to speak with more respect to the head of the church." Olivarez, who knew the character of the holy father, was satisfied with this reply, and left the consistory with a haste which excited the mirth of the sacred college.

Philip, on learning the bad success of his remonstrances, determined to strike a great blow, and to assemble a national council to depose Sixtus. He accordingly ordered his ambassador to summon the pope to appear before a synod of Spanish bishops, to hear himself condemned as an intruder, simoniac, adulterer, and heretic.

The duke, who feared the consequences of such a mission for himself, and who saw himself at the mercy of the cruel Sixtus if he obeyed, or a mark for the vengeance of the sanguinary Philip if he did not, determined to defer the citation of the pontiff until Christmas day, during the procession which was to take place then, so as to escape in the midst of the tumult. Unfortunately, the pope was warned, on the very eve of the festival, of what was to happen; he sent at once for the governor, and the two masters of ceremonies, and asked them if every thing had been prepared for the next day. On their reply that nothing was omitted, he added, "I want you to change the order of march. You governor, cause yourself to be preceded by four hundred sbirri and place yourself immediately before me, between two executioners, holding each a rope in his hands. If any one has the boldness to stop me on the way to present a writing, I wish him to be strangled at once, without any other form of process, be he prince, cardinal, or ambassador. Go and inform the representative of his Catholic majesty of my orders." Olivarez, warned of the treatment which the holy father had prepared for him, dared not leave his hotel, and contented himself with sending Philip an account, written by two Spanish cardinals, of what had taken place.

This last effort served to exasperate Sixtus against the king of Spain, and he wrote at once, through Anne Austin, his mistress, to Elizabeth, that she had only to follow the example of the Romans, who sent Scipio into Africa to subdue Carthage, that is to say, to attack Philip the Second in his own kingdom, if she wished to finish with her enemy. She had an entirely natural pretext for carrying the war into Portugal, namely, to support the pretensions of Don Antonio to the throne of that country. At the same time, he recommended her to send succour in men and money to King Henry the Fourth, to enable that prince to contend advantageously against the league, and produce a useful diversion by forcing the king of Spain to sustain the war in France.

The queen followed the advice of the pope, and made an attempt at invasion on Portugal. But this enterprise, badly conceived and still worse conducted, failed completely, which so worried the pope, that he sent for Carey and ordered him to write at once to Elizabeth, that her conduct in Portugal had been that of a woman, not of a queen; and that all was lost if she acted in the same way in France, and did not make haste to place, at the disposal of Henry the Fourth, all the force she could spare. In fact, notwithstanding his efforts and his skill, the king of Navarre was constrained to abandon Paris, and to fall back on the provinces of the centre, to avoid measuring his strength with the allied army of the duke of Mayenne, and the duke of Parma, the governor of the Low Countries, who, by order of the king of Spain, had come to reinforce the leaguers, and to raise the siege of Paris, at the moment when the inhabitants, under the pressure of famine, were about to open their gates.

De Thou relates, that more than thirty thousand persons died of famine during this terrible blockade, which lasted for several months; that the Parisians made a kind of bread out of the bones of the dead, ground to flour, which was called the Montpensier bread, because it was believed that that princess had suggested the first idea of it. He affirms that he saw bands of famished soldiers traverse the streets chasing children, and disemboweling them to eat them, and that the mother disputed with these cannibals for pieces of the flesh to devour them.

It was only then that the Jesuits Bellarmine and Panigarole, permitted the Parisians to open conferences with the renegade Henry of Navarre, without incurring anathema. But during these conferences, the approach of the troops of the duke of Parma having compelled Henry to raise the siege, the city was freed from the blockade, and could be provisioned. From that moment the boldness of the leaguers re-awoke, fanaticism resumed its superiority, and the Jesuits, profiting by the circumstance to strengthen their sway over the minds, attributed the unhoped for succour to their prayers, and organised a procession to render thanks to God.

The legate of the pope, and the bishop of Senlis assisted at this ceremony, and opened the march, with a cross in the right hand and a halberd in the left; after them came twelve hundred monks, wearing cuirasses above their frocks, and having casques over their hoods; six hundred Jesuits, and two hundred priests, armed with old muskets, pikes, and sabres, closed the procession. But that which, above all, excited the applause of the devotees, was a lame monk, called Father Bernard, and surnamed the little Feuillant, a kind of charlatan monk, rope dancer, and juggler, who ran unceasingly from the head to the rear of the procession with surprising agility, now on his head and hands, now on stilts, stopping from time to time to brandish a large sword, which he plunged down his throat, and which he drew back very skilfully by means of an ingenious mechanism which caused the sword to re-enter its scabbard.

These religious saturnalia served to exasperate the pope against the Jesuits, the originators of them, and as he dreaded to see the preponderance of this execrable order still further increased, he determined to take a vigorous resolution respecting them. He ordered their general to prohibit all his subordinates from residing in the palaces of princes under the specious pretext of being their confessors; he wished also to recall such of them as were traversing Scotland, the Low Countries, Ireland, and England, under the name of missionaries, but in reality, to excite troubles in those countries; and, finally, he declared, in full consistory, that it was actual blasphemy to call any religious order, Jesuits; that this name implied of itself a false idea that Christ was the founder of it, and he desired that in future the disciples of Ignatius Loyola, would call themselves Ignatians. He added also that his patience was exhausted, that the knaveries, crimes, debauchery, and insatiable ambition of the members of this society, compelled him to carry on a reform among them, and cut out the evil by the roots. On the next day they affixed to the statue of Pasquin, "Sixtus the Fifth is tired of life." Some days after, the 27th of August, 1590, his holiness died from being poisoned.

Several historians maintain that the crime was committed at the instigation of Spain, by an apothecary named Magin, who mixed poison in pills of manna, which the holy father took twice a month. Meteren and some other writers affirm, positively, that the Jesuits were the authors of it. For ourselves, in the uncertainty in which we are placed as to pronouncing upon either of these opinions, we admit them both, and that the more reasonably, since his holiness himself so thought, when, on his death-bed, he said to the cardinal Montalto, "God is unwilling that the kingdom of Naples should be united to the church, for King Philip has discovered our design, and the Jesuits have punished me for it."

Sixtus the Fifth, during the whole of his reign, preferred to govern as a prince rather than a pope; which induced Leti, in the justification he undertook to make of this pontiff, to say, "Thus in his capacity of sovereign he was obliged to use bad faith and duplicity, and to employ intrigue and treason, and even commit crimes, to make his designs successful; but that in his sacerdotal functions, he remained always holy among the holy, and orthodox among the orthodox."

Sixtus had not, in fact, recoiled before any means to restore to the papacy its former splendour; he had armed kings against each other, and during the terrible combats he had excited, he hovered over Europe from the heights of Rome, ready to pounce upon the vanquished, like crows on the dead bodies at the close of a battle. His rapacity and cruelty had excited such a hatred against him, that on the day of his death, a revolution broke out in the holy city; the people ran to arms, broke the statues of the tyrant, drove off his satellites, and went to besiege the Vatican to seize the dead body and cast it into the Tiber.

URBAN THE SEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1590.]

Election of the cardinal Castagna—His history before his pontificate—His holiness remits to the indigent the debts they had contracted at the pawnbrokers—Virtues of Pope Urban—His plans of reform—He dies like his predecessor, poisoned by the Jesuits.

THE Spaniards were delighted at the death of Sixtus the Fifth; the leaguers of France also made festivals commemorative of that happy event, and the Jesuit Aubri, the curate of St. André des Arcs, even pronounced in his pulpit the following discourse:—"God has delivered us in good season of an execrable pope, my brethren, for if he had lived much longer, we would have been obliged to have excommunicated him, since he was an adulterer, an incestuous person, a simoniac, a magician, a sodomite, and a heretic. This wretch was not content with robbing the faithful to enrich his nieces and nephews, who were so many minions and mistresses for him, he even desired to declare himself the protector of the Bearnese, the better to weigh us down; but God has crushed this satan crowned with a tiara."

After the funeral of Sixtus, the cardinals, seventy in number, assembled in conclave and went to caballing as usual. But on the seventh day, some of the candidates having desisted from their pretensions in favour of the cardinal of St. Marcel, his party found itself the strongest, and it was foreseen that the day would not pass by without his being named pope.

In this foresight, the conclavists packed up the goods of the cardinals, and themselves broke down the partitions between the cells, to take away from the soldiers all hopes of pillage, as was practised at elections. All the sacred college assisted at the celebration of divine service, in the Pauline chapel, and then proceeded to count the votes. The cardinal Castagna de St. Marcel, obtained two-thirds of the votes, as was expected, and was proclaimed pope; but it was agreed among the cardinals, that they would keep his promotion secret for some hours, to give time to the domestics to carry off the baggage which had been prepared; and they burned the ballots, as was done in the other sessions, which indicated that the pope was not chosen; only they proclaimed, that they would not be long in terminating the conclave. In fact, as soon as the moving was over, they went to the royal saloon, to clothe themselves in their rockets and camails, when they returned to the Pauline chapel and adored the new pontiff, who took the name of Urban the Seventh.

John Baptist Castagna was born at Rome; his father was named Cosmo, and his mother Riccia; having arrived at the age of manhood, the young Cosmo surrendered himself with ardour to the study of the civil and canon law, which at that period were more necessary in order to reach ecclesiastical dignities, than a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He was distinguished by Pius the Fourth, who appointed him one of his deputies to the council of Trent, and gave him, successively, the nunciatures of Spain and Venice. He also discharged an extraordinary legation at Cologne, under Gregory the Thirteenth, and superintended the negotiations for a treaty which was to have been made between Philip the Second and the Low Countries. The skill which he displayed in this mission, procured for him enormous benefices and a cardinal's hat as a recompense.

Sixtus the Fifth loaded him with favours, attached him to his private councils, and during his whole reign, did not cease to advise with him on all important questions of government. Every time that his holiness was called upon to express an opinion about Castagna, he said, that this cardinal was the member of the sacred college, who best understood the duties of the papacy, that he hoped with his aid to tame the Jesuits, and that he asked from God but one favour, when he should have recalled him to himself, which was, to have him for a successor.

The election of Urban the Seventh was received with the more joy by the burghers and workmen of Rome, since he had acquired the friendship of the citizens by an unbroken probity in his administrative functions, and by the equity he had always shown in the exercise of justice.

Moreover, his first acts as sovereign pontiff corresponded perfectly with their antecedents; on the very day of his coronation, he paid, from his own purse, all the debts to the pawn-brokers, and ordered his officers to distribute bread and viands among the poor of the city and suburbs. Some days after he had a census taken of the poor who were unable to work, and charged himself with providing for their wants; he even made an ordinance which enjoined on the bakers to increase the weight of bread, improve its quality, and lower the price of it, so that the people should have wholesome food, and should not be deceived in their purchases.

This good pope was so great an enemy to nepotism, that he replied to the cardinals who proposed to him to fill the principal dignities of the court of Rome with his near relatives, "No, I do not wish to give offices to members of my family, so that I may not be restrained by any considerations, if those to whom I give my confidence become prevaricators, and I am obliged to act against them."

Urban was simple in his language, modest in his manners, of an evangelical mildness, which, however, did not exclude him from a love of the arts, for he announced that it was his intention to continue the edifices and architectural works commenced by Sixtus the Fifth. He even had the courage to blame the policy of his predecessor, and informed the ambassadors of the powers, that he wished, during his reign, the people should see hostilities end, and that the princes should labour with him to restore concord among the faithful, not by terror or the fear of punishment, but by persuasion and mildness. To commence this work of pacification, he appointed a commission, which was to proceed without delay to the reform of the religious orders, and particularly to that of the company of Jesus, the centre of every intrigue, the hearth-stone of all the fires which covered the kingdoms. But the good fathers knew how to prevent this, and in less than twelve days after his exaltation, on the 26th of September, he died, poisoned, says Mezerai, in the same way as Sixtus the Fifth; by the agency of the Jesuits.

GREGORY THE FOURTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1590.]

Election of the cardinal of Cremona—His history before his pontificate—Demands of the Catholics of France—The new pope declares for the league—He excommunicates the king of Navarre—He favours Spain and the Jesuits—His death.

AFTER the funeral of the virtuous Urban the Seventh, fifty-two cardinals entered the conclave and proclaimed, on motion of Montalto, the cardinal Nicholas of Cremona sovereign pontiff by the name of Gregory the Fourteenth. "He was a man not made to command," say historians; "pusillanimous, slothful, and infatuated with his person, he had none of the knowledge necessary for a mere bishop." Thus his exaltation to the chair of the apostle was a true public calamity.

Five days after his coronation, he announced himself favourable to the Jesuits and joined Spain and the league to avoid the fate of his predecessors. "He did more," says Mezerai, "he employed the treasures which Sixtus the Fifth had left in the cellars of the Vatican, and which Urban the Seventh had not touched, to levy an army of twelve thousand men, which he sent to the aid of the league, the command of which was confided to Count Hercules Spondiato, his nephew, whom he had created duke of Monte Marciano. He then published two monitory letters, which enjoined on ecclesiastics, lords, magistrates, and the faithful to leave the kingdom of Henry of Bourbon in fifteen days' time, under penalty of excommunication; he fulminated new bulls of anathema against the king, declaring him to be a relapsed heretic, deprived of his crown and all his domains and lordships.

Marcellino Laudiano, the keeper of the seals of the court of Rome, was ordered to go to France with some Jesuits to spread those bulls through the kingdom, and to set them up in all the cities which held for the league. But these censures, instead of the good which the pope expected, produced a very bad effect. The parliament, which was at Tours, whither Henry the Third had transferred it and the chamber of Chalons, which was a part of it, condemned the pontifical bulls to be burned; and ordered the body of the nuncio who was the bearer of them to be seized. An assembly of bishops declared that they were contrary to the canons, the councils, the spirit of evangelical doctrine, as well as the constant usages of the Gallic church; that they were abusive in their groundwork and form. The king, instead of losing his authority through them, found himself stronger than ever, and revoked the ancient edicts against the Huguenots.

Gregory did not permit himself to be defeated by this check; he entered into an active correspondence with the Sixteen, and openly urged the leaguers to present the crown of France to the king of Spain. He had not, however, the satisfaction to see the realisation of his plan; he died fifteen days afterwards, on the 15th of October, 1591.

INNOCENT THE NINTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1591.]

Election of Innocent the Ninth—His history before his pontificate—His virtues and talents—He wishes to pacify Europe and reform the church—He dies after a reign of two months.

As soon as the mortal remains of Gregory the Fourteenth had been deposited in the vaults of St. Peter, the cardinals entered the conclave. Before closing the doors, the ambassadors of the different powers came, according to custom, to recommend their creatures; the doors and windows were then walled up, and the intrigues commenced. One night was enough to choose a pope; the Spanish cardinals paid for votes in cash, and in the morning Sforza, Mendoza, Gaëtan, Borromeo, Ascanio Colonna, Mathei, Lancelot, and Montalto, went to the chamber of Santi Quattro, where Sfondrato with his partizans already was, and announced to him, that they were about to nominate him as sovereign pontiff at once. The other cardinals who had been gained over applauded this proposal, and led Fachinetti de Santi Quattro to the Pauline chapel, where they chose him by acclamation, and proclaimed him supreme chief of the church by the name of Innocent the Ninth.

The new pope was immediately placed in the chair of the apostle, and received the adoration of the sacred college; he was then seated on the altar and received the second adoration; finally, they mounted him on a lofty throne, which priests bore on their shoulders and carried him to the church of St. Peter. When the prayer of the holy sacrament was finished, he was placed on an elevated platform near the altar of the holy apostles, and received solemnly the third adoration.

As Innocent the Ninth had been raised by his merit alone from the lowest ranks of the clergy to the highest dignities, the Spaniards hoped to derive advantage from a pope who owed his tiara to them; it turned out otherwise. The virtuous Fachinetti was desirous of using the supreme authority for the good of the people; he first diminished the excessive imposts which Sixtus the Fifth had laid upon the holy city; he reduced his troops by one half, dismissed a large number of the courtiers and gilded valets which encumbered the halls of the Vatican, and thus procured the means of succouring the poor of Rome, without injuring the condition of the treasury. He then assembled the sacred college, and declared to his cardinals that he was determined to restore peace to Europe, to put an end to the causes of the disorders, and no longer permit the Jesuits to labour for the conversion of heretics, except by persuasion and the example of good works. This solemn declaration enlightened the Spaniards as to what they were to expect from such a pope, and his death was resolved upon. Two months after his election, on the 30th of December, 1591, the Virtuous died, poisoned by the very persons who had elevated him to the pontifical throne.

CLEMENT THE EIGHTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1592.]

Election of the cardinal Aldobrandin—His origin—The commencement of his pontificate—He wishes to have a king chosen in France—The Jesuits arm Jean Chatel against Henry the Fourth—They are driven from France—Negotiations for the absolution of Henry the Fourth—Ignominious ceremony to which the ambassadors of the king of France submit—Clement makes an effort to bring back the Greeks to orthodoxy—Letter of Henry the Fourth to the holy father—Death of Philip the Second, king of Spain—History of the inquisition during his reign—Divorce of Henry the Fourth and Queen Margaret—Affair of the marquise of Saluces—Negotiations of his holiness with Spain and England—Re-establishment of the Jesuits in France—Death of Elizabeth of England—Singular decision of the protestants—Outbreak at Rome—Death of Clement the Eighth.

NINE days after the death of Innocent the Ninth, fifty-two cardinals entered into conclave. According to the constitution of the sacred college, two thirds of the votes were necessary to choose a pope by ballot, that is to say, thirty-five votes out of fifty-two, and if there were two more, that is to say, thirty-seven, so that the election could be made spontaneously, it was called by adoration.

The Spanish ambassador negotiated so skillfully in favour of the cardinal St. Severin, his protegee, that on the very evening of entering the conclave, he had obtained thirty-seven voices. The latter wished them to proceed at once to his exaltation; but the ambassador objected that the rules demanded that he should not be present at the ceremony, and besought the cardinals of his party to wait until he had retired, and to defer the ceremony until the next day. Unfortunately, during the night, a small party was formed, which had for its leader Altaemps, and which announced that the election of the cardinal of St. Severin ought to be thwarted. Without loss of time, Montalto, who dreaded lest the malcontents should be reinforced by some defections, wished to use the stratagem which had succeeded at the preceding election, and went with his creatures to the chamber of Severin, to lead him to the Pauline chapel, and make him pope by adoration.

This time it was not so successful; the night had sufficed to procure a defection, and when the party of Severin wished to proceed to his exaltation, they found that they numbered but thirty-six. Still they made a great noise, going through the passages and exclaiming, "Severin is pope." As they were traversing the royal saloon, Altaemps met them and addressed some remarks to them, but instead of listening to him, they cried out louder, and St. Severin approached his adversary as if to embrace him, but in reality, to prevent his speaking. Altaemps, being no longer master of his anger, seized the candidate of the Spaniards by his camail and struck him in the breast two such vigorous blows with his fist, that he knocked him down. St. Severin was wrested by his partizans from the hands of his furious adversary, and though stunned by the fall, he retraced his steps in great haste to the Pauline chapel, that they should proceed without delay to his election by ballot. But, when they collected the votes, it was discovered that the thirty-six cardinals who had accompanied him into the royal saloon were reduced to thirty-three.

The cardinal St. Severin cried out treason, and wished to proceed, regarding himself as canonically chosen, since he had counted thirty-seven votes, and maintaining that the ridiculous customs of adoration or counting, did not constitute an election, and only served to collect the votes; that he was consequently pope, and that they ought to enthrone him. He had even commenced putting on the pontifical ornaments, when the cardinal de Joyeuse entered the conclave. The two parties stopped disputing, and sought to gain the newcomer to their side; he, finding himself as it were, the arbiter of the destinies of the Holy See, resolved to take advantage of the circumstance for his own interest, and to give to Christendom a chief of his own party; he avoided deciding in favour of either of them, and, under pretext of restoring harmony, proposed to make the cardinal Aldobrandin pope. By one of those strange revolutions which sometimes occur in elective assemblies, the majority abandoned their first candidate, and proclaimed the cardinal Hippolyte Aldobrandin pope, by the name of Clement the Eighth.

He was, according to an Italian historian, bolder than Boniface the Eighth and John the Twenty-third; prouder and greedier of sway than Gregory the Seventh and Sixtus the Fifth; more perfidious than Alexander the Sixth; he was, in fine, a pope who announced himself worthy to occupy the chair of the apostle. He commenced his reign by a truly extraordinary measure; he sent to inform the cardinal de Gondy, archbishop of Paris, who was preparing to go to Rome to carry proposals for peace, in the name of Henry the Fourth, that he did not wish to listen to any arrangements with a heretical king, and that he must not leave his see under penalty of suspension from his dignities, and privation of his benefices.

The cardinal was not intimidated by the threats, and urged his departure the more, since he was informed that the holy father was making his arrangements to choose a Catholic king for France. His arrival at Rome did not, however, change the dispositions of Clement, and though he attempted it, he could not prevent the publication of a brief addressed to the cardinal Sega, bishop of Florence, who was performing the functions of legate in France, since the withdrawal of Gaëtan, and in which his holiness enjoined on all the Catholic French to choose a sovereign of their own creed. The parliament of Paris hastened to register the bull, but the chamber of Châlons immediately made a decree by which Philip Sega was summoned to answer for his conduct in person, and all citizens were prohibited from preserving or publishing the bull of Clement the Eighth, from aiding the rebels, and from going to meetings held for the election of a king, under penalty, if nobles, of degradation and infamy, if ecclesiastics, of privation of their benefices, and of being treated as disturbers of the public peace, as guilty of lese-majesty, and as traitors to their country. It moreover ordered, that the cities designated by the factions as the places for the election of a king, should be razed to their foundations and never be rebuilt.

A new sentence of the parliament of Paris condemned the decree of the chamber of Châlons to be burned; the leaguers then convened the states-general, and proposed to repeal the Salic law, in order to seat on the throne of France the infanta Isabella, the daughter of Philip the Second, to marry her to the archduke Ernest, the son of the emperor of Germany, and consequently to place France beneath the yoke of the house of Austria. But the duke of Mayenne, who desired the royal crown for himself, opposed this arrangement and defeated it. The parliament then decreed the marriage of the young queen to the duke of Guise, the son of Balafre. The duke de Mayenne, discontented with this new arrangement, opposed it, and when he saw it was impossible to obtain the suffrages of the assembly for himself, he thought of treating with the king of Navarre for better terms.

From that moment, men's minds appeared to have taken an entirely different direction; the leaguers affected patriotic sentiments, declaring that it was unworthy of Frenchmen to wish to range themselves under a foreign sway. Even the bishop of Senlis, that fierce Jesuit, who had directed the procession of the league, yielded to the influence of the money of the Bearnese. "No one can doubt," said he in a sermon, "that Philip the Second, under the pretext of religion, seeks but to attain the end of his perfidious ambition; and I beseech all honest Catholics, to declare themselves, like me, the enemies of that monster." The parliament of Paris also revoked its preceding decisions, and passed a decree to prevent the elevation of any foreigner to the throne, and to revoke all it had done against the Salic law, and the fundamental constitution of the kingdom.

Finally, this assembly, convened by the pope, from which the Spaniards expected such great results, only produced a satire called Menippeus, which, by turning them into ridicule, inflicted on them a worse blow than the greatest defeat could have done. To increase their mishap, Henry the Fourth solemnly abjured Calvinism in the church of St. Denis, on Sunday the 25th of July, 1593, and was absolved by the bishop of Bourges, assisted by the cardinal Vendôme, from the anathemas and excommunications lanced against him by the court of Rome.

Philip Sega, the apostolic nuncio, who was in the interests of Spain, protested against what he called a false conversion, and maintained that a relapsed heretic could only be absolved by the pontiff. Henry then deputed the duke of Nevers to obtain from the holy father a recall of the censures pronounced against his person; but the ambassador could not change the dispositions of the Holy See. Gregory refused obstinately to absolve the king, and declared that it was his formal intention to exclude him from the throne of France.

The general of the Jesuits at the same time sent orders to the members of the society in Paris, and enjoined on them to seek out an assassin and to do with Henry the Fourth, as they had done with Henry the Third. The good fathers made inquiries in the capital and the provinces, to find what his holiness wished—a fanatic ready to sacrifice his life in the defence of religion. Their efforts were crowned with success; a poor madman, named Barrière, who had become insane from the loss of his mistress, presented himself to the Jesuits of Orleans, and offered to assassinate the king. They listened to his avowal, strengthened him in his determination, and sent him to Paris, to the reverend Father Aubry, curate of St. Andre des Arcs, who immediately conducted him to Varade, one of the heads of his order. But the effort failed. The murderer, on leaving Paris to go to the king, was arrested at Melun, with a poisoned dagger on him; being immediately put to the torture, he was, on his avowals, convicted of the crime of lese-majesty, condemned to death, and executed at once.

This fruitless effort struck a fatal blow to the league; not from the horror which the crime inspired, but only because all foresaw that the reign of the Jesuits was reaching a catastrophe. In fact, new defections occurred daily among the leaguers. Vitri, the governor of Meaux, came to surrender to Henry the keys of the fortress which he commanded; the lord of Alincourt opened the gates of Pontoise to him; the marshal de la Chartre, restored Orleans and Bourges, and Ornano submitted with the city of Lyons; finally, the duke de Mayenne having retired from Paris, the duke de Feria, the Spanish troops, and the most determined leaguers were obliged to leave the capital, and the king made his solemn entry into it, on the 22d March, 1594. The parliament decreed obedience to Henry to be obligatory on all Frenchmen, under penalty of the crime of lese-majesty, and the Sorbonne also added, under penalty of mortal sin. All the registers containing decisions injurious to the prince, were then torn up, and all the writings published against him were burned. Rouen, Laon—almost all the great cities, whole provinces, to the very extremities of the kingdom, imitated the example of Paris, and the fiercest and most powerful lords, not even excepting the duke of Guise, recognised the authority of the relapsed heretic Henry the Fourth.

But whilst all orders in the state were making a merit of their submission, it was not so with the religious orders, placed under the influence of the court of Rome; the Chartreux, the Dominicans, the Jacobins, the Capuchins, the Franciscans, and especially the Jesuits, refused to admit Henry the Fourth to a participation in the public prayers, and even uttered threats and insults so violent in their sermons, that it was determined to revive an old suit pending between the Society of Jesus and the university in regard to instruction, in order to have the children of Loyola condemned and expelled from France, without the holy father being called upon to take upon himself the responsibility of this measure. Both parties prepared for the struggle by inundating the capital with pamphlets; the friends of the university called the Jesuits poisoners, favourers of troubles, instigators of regicide, and demanded their banishment from the kingdom; the latter replied vigorously, and embittered against the university all the devotees and fanatics they could recruit. Finally, the combat became formal, and the parties appeared before the parliament. Antony Arnaud, an advocate of Paris, employed by the university, made that famous speech which is called the original sin of his family, and in which he represented the Jesuits in the most odious colours, accusing them of being the promoters of the league, the hired assassins of Philip the Second, the accomplices of Jacques Clement, Barrière, and Babington, the corrupters of youth, the enemies of the human race.

"It is time that the world had learned to know the Jesuits," exclaimed the eloquent advocate, in the warmth of his discourse; "it is time that the nations were doing justice on these sanguinary vampyres who hover over our heads, and are making ready to devour us. People, learn that these execrable props of the pope wish to do in France as they have done in America, where twenty millions of men, women, and children have been polluted, burned, or murdered under the pretext of religion. Learn that their love for gold is as insatiable as their thirst for blood, and that they have depopulated whole islands to assuage their cupidity—forcing men to bury themselves alive in the mines, and constraining women to labour on the land red with the blood of their children.

"Learn that they are the inventors of those new tortures which they have made four thousand men undergo at once, who remained exposed for whole months to all the inclemencies of the seasons, attached to each other by iron chains, entirely naked, and whipped three times a day until they shall point out the place where supposed treasures are concealed; and as these unfortunate men have nothing to discover, they become enraged at them and kill them by blows of clubs; so that these unfortunate Indians, in order to escape the barbarity of the Jesuits, fly to the mountains, where, in despair, they hang themselves to the trees of the forest with their wives and children.

"Know that these execrable disciples of Ignatius Loyola, push their barbarity so far as to hunt the fugitives like stags and wild boars, and allow their dogs to eat them; or if they save their lives, it is to compel these unfortunate beings to collect honey and wax in the forests, where they are soon suffocated by serpents, or devoured by tigers: or else it is to use them as divers, at the risk of having them eaten by sharks; or to form them into bands and send them to fight their brethren in the savannahs.

"Finally, their avarice is such, and their contempt for the human race so great, that, when they transport their slaves from one island to another, they encumber their vessels with the Indians, without taking the trouble to inquire if they are large enough to hold them all, or whether they shall not be compelled to cast some into the sea to lighten their vessel in the slightest blow. Thus, in order to navigate from the island of Lucaye to that of Cuba, there is no need of compass or chart, and it is only necessary to follow the track of the dead bodies of Indians who are floating on the sea. . ." Antony Arnaud argued, from all these facts, that it was necessary to banish these wretches from the kingdom, and urged their condemnation.

The Jesuits, unable to free themselves from all these charges, which had been sustained by incontestable witnesses and irresistible proofs, turned towards Rome and besought Clement the Eighth to interfere in the quarrel. As Henry the Fourth was very anxious to be relieved from the ecclesiastical censures, there was no difficulty in his holiness obtaining from the king, that the trial, already so many times commenced and broken off, should be again deferred for fuller information, that is, to an indefinite period. But the good fathers, foreseeing that the struggle would recommence as soon as the king had been reconciled to the church, wished to prevent the effects of his ill will, and armed an assassin against him for the second time.

A young man of nineteen, a student in one of their colleges, penetrated into the interior of the Louvre, as far as the chamber of Gabrielle d'Estrées on the very day on which Henry had arrived from Picardy and was receiving the lords of his court; and whilst the king was bending to raise two leaguers, Ragni and Monsigni, who had come to do homage to him, he struck him a blow of his knife which cut his upper lip, and broke one of his teeth. Henry immediately put his hand to his mouth, and drawing it back covered with blood, exclaimed, "I am wounded!" then, looking around him, and perceiving a woman named Mathurina, who had for a long time followed the court in the capacity of fool, he added, "To the devil with the fool! It is she who has struck me." This woman immediately ran to close the door, thus indicating that she was innocent, and that they ought to seek for the guilty. The count de Soissons then perceived by his side a young man who appeared to be very much agitated. He seized him by the arm, and seeing his agitation increase, said to him, "It is you or I who struck the blow:" then, putting his hand into his doublet, he drew out a bloody knife. His majesty wished them to let the assassin go on account of his extreme youth, and said that he pardoned him; but when, in one of his replies, the criminal declared that he came from the college of the Jesuits, the king reviewed his former decision, and ordered them to secure his person.

The grand provost immediately seized the regicide, and conducted him to the For-l'Eveque, and then to the Conciergerie, where he was interrogated by the president de Thou, and led before the parliament for judgment. He said his name was Jean Chatel; that he was the son of a rich merchant tailor, and had studied in the college of Clermont, so called, because the buildings had been given to the Jesuits by one of their protectors, the bishop of Clermont; he also avowed, that having contracted the horrid crime of sodomoy, and being unable to overcome his depraved taste, and being unwilling to lose his share of heaven, he had determined to expiate his faults by assassinating the king; which, from what he had heard in the sermons of the fathers of the college, he thought to be the action most agreeable to God. He added, that he had consulted his regent, the Jesuit Gueret, two days before the attempt, in regard to scruples of conscience, and that he had not, however, spoken to him of his plan. He was put to the torture, ordinary and extraordinary, which he supported very courageously, and without making any other avowal. His sentence of death was pronounced, and executed on the same day; the parricidal knife was placed in his right hand, thus armed, it was burned by the executioner; he was then torn with red hot pincers, dragged by four horses, and appeared insensible to the sharp pangs of the most frightful punishment; finally, his limbs, separated from the trunk, were thrown into the fire, and the ashes scattered to the winds.

The Jesuits, who had made a holy martyr of Jacques Clement, also inscribed Jean Chatel in their martyrology, but they dared not officially celebrate his worship, in consequence of the supervision exercised over their houses. Parliament ordered close examinations to be made in their colleges, which brought to light singular discoveries; amongst other things, there were found, among the papers of Father Guignard, sermons, in which that virtuous Jesuit designated Henry the Fourth by the name of the fox of Bearn; Elizabeth of England, by that of the she wolf; the king of Sweden, by that of the griffin, and the elector of Saxony, by that of the hog. There were found in a secret press different papers, in which these reverends said, that Henry of Navarre should be too happy, that they should be willing to confine him all his life in the dungeons of a monastery, that he might do penance; that he deserved a thousand deaths for his crimes and his heresies, and that if they could not kill him during the war, they must assassinate him during the peace.

These pamphlets decided the fate of the society in France, and put an end to the trial which had been going on for thirty years: they were driven from the kingdom by the following sentence of the parliament:—"We order that the priests and scholars of the Society of Jesus, disturbers of the public repose, enemies of the state, corrupters of youth, shall leave the kingdom in fifteen days, under penalty of being treated as guilty of lese-majesty; their goods shall be seized and confiscated to the profit of the king"—Father Gueret, the professor of philosophy, was, moreover, put to the torture, ordinary and extraordinary, and then exiled, and the Father Guignard was condemned to be hung on the Place de Grève.

The house of Jean Chatel was razed to the ground, and on it was erected a pyramid with four faces, on which were engraved the decree of parliament, and the inscriptions which devoted the Jesuits and their satellites to the execration of men. This condemnation, which extended to the whole order, made a great sensation in Europe, and especially at the court of Rome. Clement the Eighth, clamoured against its having gone to such an extreme; he declared, in full consistory, that the Jesuits had deserved well of the church, and made an apology for the fathers who had died in the cause of the Holy See.

"A simple decree of parliament," says l'Etoile, produced, however, in one day, what four battles could not have accomplished.—Tranquillity was restored to France, and the policy of the holy father entirely changed."

His holiness began to fear, lest the French, who had recognised the king, regardless of the excommunications of Rome, might undertake to govern the Gallic church, by creating a patriarch, charged with the direction of ecclesiastical affairs; and to avoid a blow so fatal to his authority, he sought to draw the cardinal Gondy to him, and informed that prelate, that if the king would send a solemn embassy to him, it would find him well disposed to second the pious wishes of his majesty.

Henry, who was already thinking of soliciting from Rome his divorce from Queen Margaret, sent at once Arnaud d'Ossat and De Perron, with the title of plenipotentiaries, to arrange with Clement the Eighth, the conditions of his reconciliation with the church.—But in the interval, the Spaniards having obtained some advantages over the French troops, and having even succeeding in taking Dourlens from the admiral Villars, who was murdered in cold blood by order of Contreras, the commissary general of the troops of Philip, the holy father, who had shown himself so accommodating, became exacting, and would not consent to relieve the king from the censures pronounced against him, but on the following terms:—"1. The ambassadors were to pronounce in the name of the king a solemn abjuration, and were to submit to the humiliating ceremonies used in the church on such occasions.—2. The king of France should re-establish Catholicism in Bearn, and should take under his protection all the orthodox priests, and should give them appointments on his own purse, until he had provided them with good benefices.—3. The ecclesiastics devoted to the court of Rome, should alone hold the employments and dignities of the church.—4. His majesty should publish and observe the decisions of the council of Trent, although his predecessors had declared them to be encroachments on the rights of the nation, and destructive of all freedom.—5. The king shall observe a rigorous fast for nine months, shall recite paternosters night and day, shall hear mass daily, shall confess himself at least four times a year, and shall receive the holy communion; finally, he shall build a great number of monasteries, and recall the Jesuits."

By the instructions of Henry the Fourth, the ambassadors subscribed to the demands of Clement the Eighth.

Preparations were then made for the absolution of Henry the Fourth, to which the pope wished to give an extraordinary splendour.—A spacious platform was erected in the midst of the porch of St. Peter, and on the 17th of September, in the year 1595, the pontiff sallied from the Vatican, escorted by all his cardinals, archbishops, bishops, great officers, penitentiaries, masters of ceremonies, and went to occupy a magnificent throne, covered with rich hangings of silk and gold, glittering with precious stones, which was raised on the platform facing the church, whose doors were closed. Du Perron and d'Ossat approached the throne, with their heads uncovered, in the attitude of suppliants, prostrated themselves on all the steps of the platform, and humbly kissed the feet of the pope; then, without rising, they abjured, in a loud and mournful voice, Calvinism in the name of their master. Clement then read them the conditions to which Henry must submit, to obtain his absolution; after which they swore upon the gospel, in the presence of all the people and the ambassadors, that their king would conform to all the wishes of the court of Rome; he then made them a sign to lay flat on their stomachs, and arming himself with the rod of a burgher, he gave them three blows in honour of the Holy Trinity; he then placed his foot on their necks, and the clergy thundered forth the Miserere.

At the end of each verse, his holiness struck the two representatives of the king of France with his rod, and that so vigorously, that d'Aubigné, who has left us a description of this ceremony, says, that the poor ambassadors had blue and black marks on their shoulders for several weeks. What he thought of the conduct of Henry the Fourth on this occasion, may be judged from the manner in which he expresses himself:—"Do you not perceive how the state submits to the church; since the king, who has shown himself so brave on the battle field, debases himself before the mules of the pope; how graciously he receives the cuffs of his holiness in the persons of his ambassadors, who are crouched on their bellies to dig the ground like a pair of mackerel on a griddle, from the Miserere to the Vitulos. Still, as if this excess of baseness was not enough to reconcile the prince with heaven, he must play the same game with Monseigneur the Roman legate, and the most he could obtain was to keep on his stockings to receive the holy cuff."

This humiliating ceremony over, Du Perron and d'Ossat arose, and the holy father performed the formula of the absolution in a loud voice:—"By the authority of God all powerful, by that of the blessed apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and by my own, which is above all the powers of the earth, I absolve Henry of Bourbon, king of France." The gates of the church were immediately opened; Clement turned towards the two ambassadors, and extending his arms towards the church added, "Now that I have opened the gates of the church to your master, remember, he must avoid compelling me to shut them again." The cannon of the castle of San Angelo fixed its salvos, the sound of the trumpet joined the noise of the artillery, and taught the world that the king of France had the cowardice to crouch in the dust at the feet of a pope!

Notwithstanding this degrading concession of Henry the Fourth, or perhaps on account of the submission of the king, his holiness delayed for a whole month the promulgation of the bull of absolution, so as to give time to the duke of Mayenne and the Spaniards to gain serious victories over him, and to free him, if necessary, from publishing it at all. The king, says Mezerai, had no sooner received the news of his absolution, than he rendered thanks to God through all his kingdom, and commanded parliament to take off the prohibition of going to Rome. He also declared that he wished the concordat signed with the pope to be religiously observed, and in all his actions sought to testify his gratitude to the sovereign pontiff Clement the Eighth.

Thus was accomplished the most illustrious and most cowardly of conversions; thus became a Catholic a second time, a debauched, egotistical, and perfidious prince, who had already denied Catholicism and Calvinism, and who had relapsed a second time. Flatterers of kings, stipendiary writers for despotism, have endeavoured to excuse the knavery of Henry the Fourth, whom they call Henry the Great, by putting in his mouth this pretended witticism, "Paris is well worth a mass." No cowardly flatterers of power; no, servile adorers of the golden calf, neither France, nor the whole world could draw a man truly great to play the part of a hypocrite, to feign belief in the superstitions of the papacy, to deceive the nations, to lie to his conscience. It is true, these maxims are the rules of kings and priests, but in the eyes of those called the men of the people, they are rejected, and execrable maxims and such conduct is the height of cowardice and infamy.

Forced to renounce, for some time at least, the hope of exciting new troubles in France, Clement turned to Italy and lanced a bull of excommunication against Cæsar of Este, duke of Ferrara, who, on the death of Duke Alphonso, his great uncle, had taken upon himself the government of the duchy, amid the acclamations of the grandees and the people, and who had committed the grievous crime of not loving the Jesuits, and of desiring to be tolerant. His holiness gave as a reason for this, that the illegitimacy of the birth of the father of Cæsar, should exclude the latter from the throne, a reason which, in every age, and even in our own day, would call into question the heirships of a great number of kings. To the allegations of the court of Rome, the duke opposed the legitimation of Don Alphonso, his father, by a subsequent marriage between Laura, his grandmother, and Duke Alphonso the First; he also produced the bulls of Alexander the Sixth, which called him to the succession of the crown of Ferrara. Notwithstanding the justice of these observations, the apostolic chamber followed up the course of this singular proceeding, and pronounced an anathema, with its accessories of severity, such as privation of honours and dignities; a declaration of the nullity of the oaths of fidelity taken by his subjects; a spiritual interdict over all the dominions of the house of Este; the cession of all its property, and that of its favourers and adherents to the first occupant; exhortations to the emperor, to kings, republics and princes, to aid the church to crush the anathematized; apostolical benedictions; a remission of all sins, and a distribution of plenary indulgences for those who should take up arms, or who should even only pray for the success of the plans of the pope; the annulling of all treaties and contracts made with Cæsar of Este; and, finally, a prohibition, under penalty of excommunication, of affording him aid, and even of permitting the passage of his troops and those of the princes his allies.

This time the thunders of the Vatican produced a marvellous effect; Clement the Eighth was honoured. His army invaded the dominions of Cæsar, and the latter, finding no means of escaping from his formidable foe, determined to yield that which was about to be taken from him by force.

Clement then took possession of Ferrara, and built a fine citadel, in which he deposited more than two millions in gold, taken from the city; and to consecrate this usurpation, he erected, still at the expense of the city, a statue cast in bronze; he then passed on to other occupations, and published different decrees about the administration of the apostolic purse, so as to increase his revenues. He was also engaged, in imitation of his predecessor, in correcting the holy books, and produced a Bible expunged from two thousand faults, which he declared to be the only canonical one, fulminating anathemas against such of his successors as should dare to add new corrections to it. He then lanced another bull, which prohibited Italians, of every state and condition, from dwelling in countries which were destitute of priests, or even those in which they could not openly profess the Catholic faith. He, moreover, prohibited them from marrying heretic wives, or from being attended in sickness by protestant or Calvinist physicians, and the Catholic physicians from healing the sick of the reformed communion; since, added he, it is better for the faithful to attain eternal life by a voluntary sacrifice, than to preserve temporal life through the aid of a heretic; and that they should trouble themselves no more about a protestant than about a dog.

This singular bull was only obligatory towards protestants and Calvinists, and not to the Greek schismatics; for the sovereign pontiff, finding that the influence of the Holy See was diminishing in the west, began to turn his attention towards the east, and proposed to bring about a reunion of the Greeks and Latins.

He had already received, with great demonstrations of joy, a monk who pretended that he had been sent by the patriarch of Constantinople, to take the oath of obedience to the Holy See; and he had even seated him several times on his right in the consistories at which he received the ambassadors of all the powers of Europe, when he was one day informed that the Greek plenipotentiary was a skilful swindler, and that he had left Rome, carrying off the rich presents designed for the patriarch. In France, matters were not going on any more in accordance with his desires, and notwithstanding the opposition of the legate of the holy father, Henry the Fourth published the famous edicts of Nantz in favour of the Calvinists, which resumed in its tenor all the treaties which had been concluded at different periods with Charles the Ninth, or Henry the Third, and guaranteed to them the free exercise of the reformed religion.

All cause for civil war being removed, tranquillity reappeared, and the king was enabled to employ all his forces against the archduke Albert, the lieutenant of Philip the Second, and the duke of Savoy, the ally of Spain. He marched in person on Amiens, which the enemy's general had surprised, forced him to evacuate it, and fall back on the cities of the north. On the other side, the marshal Leclerc went in pursuit of the bands of the duke of Savoy, and defeated them on all points. Philip, having no more money in his coffers, nor soldiers to be murdered, desired peace with France, and charged the pope to make overtures on the subject. His holiness accepted the mission of mediator, on condition, that after the arrangements were concluded, the king of Spain should employ all his influence with the Catholic princes, to form a formidable league against the Turks, who had already invaded Hungary, and threatened to fall on Italy. Clement designated Vervius as the place for the meeting of the plenipotentiaries; the cardinal of Florence, and Francis Gonzaga, the bishop of Mantua, were appointed by his holiness to preside over the conferences, and to fix the conditions of peace, conjointly with the representatives of Spain, Richardot, Taxis, and Verreikens, as well as with the French ambassadors Bellicore and Sillery, and the delegates of the duke of Savoy.

A treaty extremely favourable for Henry the Fourth was signed by the belligerent parties, and the cruel Philip was compelled to renounce for ever his plans on the crown of France. God, moreover, seemed to take pleasure in humbling this proud prince, by taking from him, towards the end of his career, one after another, all the hopes he had conceived; thus, in the Low Countries, he was compelled, as he had been in France, to put an end to the war, without having been able to assure the triumph of the papacy. All the massacres of the duke of Alba, all the butcheries of the duke of Parma, all the atrocities committed by the governors of the Low Countries, who had so cruelly ravaged that magnificent country in his name, and by his orders, had only produced a terrible revolution. The Belgians had risen against their oppressors, and the love of liberty having increased their strength tenfold, they had been enabled to drive the troops of the tyrant out of their territories, and to form different independent states, by the name of the United Provinces.

Freed from the tyranny of Philip, Belgium, Flanders, and Holland had promptly repaired their disasters, and had elevated themselves to such a degree of prosperity, that they were soon enabled to claim, from the Portuguese and Spaniards, a part of the rich possessions on which these latter had seized in the East and West Indies.

Philip then endeavoured to rally the Belgians to his cause, and to bring them back beneath his sway, by granting freedom of conscience to all their provinces without distinction, and by recognising their independence of the crown of Spain; he even yielded his right of sovereignty to the archduke Albert, who had married his daughter Isabella; but these tardy concessions no longer satisfied the reformed. His offers were rejected, and Maurice of Nassau, the stadtholder of Holland, and leader of the armies of the Low Countries, taught him, by the brilliant victory which he gained over his troops near Terrehaut, that there is a time, in which people, tired of oppression, no longer accept concessions, and dictate themselves their terms to kings.

At last the infamous Philip yielded to an attack of the gout, and Spain was delivered from the monster, who had for so many years covered its provinces with scaffolds and auto-da-fes.

It is related that, in his last sickness, as the physicians were consulting whether it was proper to bleed him, he said to them, "Do you think that a king, who has shed blood enough to form rivers, fears to have a few drops taken from him? No, do it fearlessly, restore me to health, that I may be enabled to achieve what remains for me to do, and annihilate the heretics to the last man." These sacrilegious wishes, formed by Philip on his bed of death, were not realised. Happily for the Spaniards, science was powerless to save his life, and he carried with him to the tomb the execration of the people.

During his reign the fury of the inquisition was carried further than it had ever been before or since; and we may affirm that Philip the Second was a more terrible scourge for Spain and the Low Countries, than the plague. It was he who made those impious ordinances which encouraged informers; it was he who condemned to be burned booksellers, who sold, bought, or lent, books forbidden by the inquisition; it was he who solicited from the court of Rome those bulls which enjoined on priests, to exact from their penitents the denunciations of those of their relatives or friends, who were guilty of possessing the prohibited books; an enormous crime in his eyes, and which was sufficient to condemn the most virtuous persons to the flames; it was still he who organised, with his grand inquisitor Valdez, those auto-da-fes at Seville and Valladolid, in which three hundred victims were exhibited, at so many stakes, and were burned alive amidst the applause of Don Carlos, the princess Joanna, and the lords of the court.

It is computed that, in a period of forty years, that is, during the reign of Philip the Second, the inquisition burned, tortured, or beheaded, more than twenty-five thousand persons, Jews, Moors, or Spaniards, independently of those who were condemned to prison, confiscation, or banishment, and of whom the number was four times greater, and that in the peninsula alone; for, if there be added to these the condemnations in other countries subject to the crown of Spain, such as Sicily, Sardinia, Flanders, America, the Indies, the kingdom of Naples, &c., &c., we should be frightened at the quantity of victims whom the holy office put to death, to make them better Catholics.

The cruel Philip the Second gloried in his religious fanaticism, and was accustomed to say, that he would prefer seeing the last Spaniard tortured by the last executioner, and reign over an immense desert, rather than suffer a single heretic in his dominions. He carried his hatred for those who followed the doctrines of Luther or Calvin so far, that on the day of an auto-da-fe, a protestant gentleman named Sessa, having exclaimed, whilst passing before his throne, "Oh, prince, can you then take pleasure in beholding the torments of your subjects? Save us from this cruel death which we have not merited!" He replied, "No, ye accursed, go to the eternal fire, and know that I would carry the wood myself to burn my son, if he were accused of heresy." He afterwards realised this threat, and allowed his son to be condemned by the inquisitors; he did more, he refused even to bid him a last farewell. Before this, this monster had not feared to express his sacrilegious intention of exhuming the dead body of Charles the Fifth, his father, to proceed against him as a heretic, and to burn him in an auto-da-fe. God finally performed justice on the tyrant, and freed unhappy Spain from him.

This death also freed Henry the Fourth from a formidable enemy, and permitted him to bestow all his care on the internal government of his kingdom; he commenced by marrying his sister, who had remained a Huguenot, to the duke of Bar, of the family of Lorraine, who was a zealous Catholic; and when the marriage had been consummated, he wrote to Clement the Eighth to ask his approval of it.

His holiness, wounded by what he considered a want of respect, declared that the duke of Bar had incurred excommunication by marrying a heretic, and fulminated a sentence of anathema against him. The court of Rome remained inflexible to every remonstrance made by Henry on the subject, and would not take off its censures until the princess was converted. As this poor woman was unwilling to abandon her religious belief, she was exposed to such bad treatment from her bigot husband, that she died of despair. Henry the Fourth was not disturbed by the grief of his unfortunate sister, and entirely occupied with his new passion for Gabrielle d'Estrées, dutchess of Beaufort, he appeared to be occupied with nothing else than the pursuit of his divorce from Queen Margaret. If we may believe Perefice, the king wished to marry his mistress, in order to legitimatise his bastards, but he was careful not to express his thoughts; on the contrary, he solemnly demanded in marriage Mary de Medicis, the niece of Ferdinand, grand duke of Tuscany, the protegé of the pontiff, so that the court of Rome should interpose no obstacle to this project of divorce.

Skilful as was this manœuvre, Clement the Eighth was not the dupe of it; he penetrated the secret intentions of the king, and determined to render the execution of them impossible. He, however, allowed none of his suspicions to appear; he received kindly the cardinal d'Ossat, the ambassador of the prince in the affair of the divorce, and asked from him for a delay of some days, so as to confer with the members of the sacred college on the request which was presented to him; then a second delay, in order to discuss the conditions of it; and, finally, he protracted the thing so, that the French plenipotentiary, tired of waiting, and suspecting some infernal machination, declared to him sharply, that if he did not hurry, his majesty, the king of France, would go on, separate himself from the court of Rome, and marry the dutchess of Beaufort.

At this declaration, his holiness expressed the greatest astonishment, and replied to the cardinal, that if such were the intentions of Henry the Fourth, he remitted to God alone the conduct of this affair; he then ordered public prayers and fasts in the holy city, to obtain from heaven the safety of France; he remained for two days shut up in his chapel in the Vatican. On the third day, in the morning, after opening the despatches he received from Paris, he determined to appear in public, and ordered a solemn service in the church of St. Peter. It was remarked that he remained for about an hour with his arms crossed on his breast, and his eyes closed, as if he was ravished in an ecstasy; after this he appeared to waken, and exclaimed in a loud voice, "My brethren, Christ has provided for the safety of the kingdom of France." On that same evening, the cardinal d'Ossat received a courier, who announced to him the death of the beautiful Gabrielle d'Estrées. Now if we seek to know how his holiness had predicted so justly, we will say, that by a singular chance, he found that the interval which separated the arrival of the courier of the pope from that of the courier of the ambassador, coincided precisely with the interval which was to elapse between the time in which the mistress of the king took the poison and that of her death. What is still more strange, is, that from this day, Clement made no more objections to the divorce of the king, and that he showed himself to be as yielding as he had before been scrupulous. His holiness gave, on this occasion, full powers to the cardinal de Joyeuse, Horace de Monte, a Neapolitan, archbishop of Arles, and the nuncio Gaspard de Modena. These ecclesiastics declared the marriage of Henry the Fourth null, and permitted him, as well as Margaret, to remarry. The king went at once to Lyons and espoused Mary de Medicis.

This year, which was the last of the century, and, consequently, that of the universal jubilee, gave an opportunity to his holiness to fill his treasury with the money of the imbecile pilgrims who came to buy indulgences. The number of fanatical devotees and curious persons who flowed into Rome was so great, that in the single hospital of the Trinity, which had been transformed into an immense hotel, kept for the profit of the pope, as many as five hundred thousand travellers were received, independently of all those who were lodged in the other hospitals, from which the sick had been ejected, in the monasteries of men or women, or in private houses; finally, it was computed that there were more than three millions of visitors in the course of the year. All the cellars of the Vatican were filled with tons of gold or silver, and Clement was even compelled to ask the general of the Jesuits, to place the cellars of his college at his disposal, to deposit there the presents of the pilgrims. Aquinviva, who was then the head of the society, placed at the disposal of the pontiff not only the buildings, but even the most distinguished members of his order to second him in his traffic in indulgences and absolutions, hoping that his zeal would conciliate the friendship of Clement to him and predispose him in favour of the company of Jesus, when he should be called upon to decide the quarrel which had broken out between the Jesuits of Spain and the Dominicans, in regard to spiritual doctrines concerning grace, which had been going on for several years between them, especially on the part of Father Molina, whom the disciples of St. Dominic maintained was tainted by the heresy of Pelagius.

After the jubilee, his holiness did indeed interfere in the dispute, but without deciding for either of the parties, and contented himself with appointing arbitrators, who were to put an end to these scandalous quarrels. The commissioners formed themselves into bodies, which they called "de auxiliis" and treated the questions in litigation very carefully, both in speech and writing, and however desirous they might have been to show deference to the holy father, they declared that they were forced to condemn the opinions of Molina as false, erroneous, untenable, and improbable.

The Jesuits, finding that even the protection of the pope did not afford them a triumph over their enemies, thought to gain time by asking that the controverted propositions should be again discussed in the conferences; which was granted to them. The generals of the two orders went to these conferences with theologians, and the discussions recommenced under the presidency of the cardinal Mandruce, who was commissioned by Clement to pronounce a final judgment. The Jesuits were again defeated on all points; Mandruce, who had at first appeared to favour the doctrines of Molina, finished by joining his adversaries. Every thing then presaged the condemnation of the Jesuits, when, on the eve of the day fixed for the pronouncement of the judgment, the cardinal died of poison. The good fathers took occasion of it to ask for a new delay to prepare for other conferences; but Clement, who feared to see the quarrel become daily more envenomed, and urge them both into revelations dangerous for the papacy, determined to take a side, and appointed commissaries to examine the books of Molina in his presence. Their conclusions were similar to those of the first judges, that is, unfavorable for the society. The Jesuits of Spain, who dreaded, more than any thing in the world, to be defeated on so important a question, then undertook to force even the will of the pope, by setting his authority at defiance. They embittered all the colleges of their order against Clement the Eighth, expressed doubts as to the lawfulness of his enthronement, and maintained, in their theses, that we are not bound to conform to the decision of a pope on a matter of faith.

This bold conduct irritated the holy father, and he would doubtless have determined to dissolve the society, had he not been arrested by the powerful interference of Philip the Third, who desired the maintenance of an order which aided in plunging his people in ignorance and brutality.

Moreover, the services which the English Jesuits were rendering him, and the efforts which those of France were making to bring back that country beneath his sway, pleaded in favour of the order, and it is but just to admit, that they both employed, for the success of their plans, a perseverance and activity worthy of a better cause. The Jesuits of England, banished from that kingdom by different decrees, did not fear to return to it, after the death of Elizabeth, to renew fresh intrigues; the Jesuits of France, driven from the provinces by the decrees of parliament and the declarations and letters patent of the king, addressed to the highest tribunals, had been able to maintain themselves within the jurisdiction of the parliaments of Bordeaux and Toulouse, and to interest, in their favour, a number of influential lords of the court, and particularly the queen, Mary de Medicis.

They had already, on the occasion of the marriage of the king, deputed Fathers Lorenzo, Maggio and Gentil, to claim the execution of the promise he had made, at the time of his absolution, to recall them. But on the refusal of Henry to listen to their request, they declared themselves, scattered pamphlets in Paris against the authority of the king and parliament, and amongst others the apologetic complaints published at Bordeaux by Father Richomme, and for which a bookseller named Chevalier was arrested. From that moment the society declared themselves at open war with the king; their college of Dole, situated on the frontier, became the place of meeting of all the discontented, and the centre of the operations directed against Henry; they soon even organised a conspiracy, in which, as always, they took the most active part, with such precaution, that it was impossible to prove their participation in it when the plot was discovered. They also excited troubles at Lyons, preached regicide openly, and inspired so great alarm in Henry, that he determined to make peace with them.

He first sought to bring into his way of thinking the great dignitaries, whose extreme repugnance for such a measure he well knew, and having assembled his principal officers he thus addressed them: "We must, my lords, through necessity, recall the Jesuits simply and purely into our kingdom, discharge them from the sentences of infamy and opprobrium which they have justly incurred, or else pursue them with inexorable rigour, so that they may never approach us or our kingdom. This last will throw them into the most dangerous irritation, and the efforts against our person will be so multiplied, that we shall be obliged to be unceasingly on our guard; to wear a cuirass even in our own apartments; to take no food without having it examined by our physicians; to tremble even at the approach of our best subjects, for these people carry on correspondence every where, and have a great skill in moulding minds as they please; finally our life will become so miserable, that it were better for us that we were already dead."

From commiseration with the apprehensions of Henry, the lords to whom he addressed himself, amongst others, his minister Sully, were unwilling to combat his reasoning, and declared that they agreed with his wisdom. Henry the Fourth, without any delay, expedited letters patent for the re-establishment of the Society of Jesus in France. But the parliament was less docile than the court, and refused to register them, until the fathers had changed their names from Jesuits, which was held in execration by all bodies in the state, and had modified their statutes. The members of parliament demanded that the company should not remain under the authority of a foreign general, and that it should choose a superior who resided in the kingdom; they, moreover, demanded that it should be submitted to the ordinary jurisdiction; that it should suppress in its vows the engagement of particular obedience to the pope, that it should only authorise the admission into its ranks of born subjects of the king, that it should be constrained to follow the university regulations, and that it should renounce the heirship of the property of its members to the prejudice of their families. The disciples of Loyola refused to adhere to these conditions, and an order from the king enjoined on the magistrates to register purely and simply the letters patent, which authorised the Jesuits to return to France. Some years afterwards, Henry the Fourth received the just reward of this despotic act; and the effort of Ravillac taught the nations how the Jesuits paid a benefactor. It is true they owed no great gratitude to a prince for a concession which they knew they had wrung from him by alarm. They feigned, however, to attribute his new dispositions to entirely different sentiments, and they thanked him for the benevolent support which he gave to their order. Still more, Father Cotton, who became his confessor, and several of his companions, asked to embrace him as a sign of sincere reconciliation, of forgetfulness of the past and of confidence in the future.

As soon as they found themselves all powerful in France, the Jesuits forgot the promises they had made to Clement the Eighth, to labour to subject the kingdom to him, and occupied themselves with their old quarrels with the Dominicans about grace and free will. They signified to his holiness, that he must decide in their favour and canonise Ignatius Loyola their founder, if he wished to retain them in obedience to him. Instead of obeying their injunctions, the pontiff decided definitely for the Dominicans, and granted the honours of the apotheosis to Charles Borromeo, the nephew of Pius, one of the former heads of their order, and one of the most passionate inquisitors that ever lived.

The Jesuits were unwilling to let this affront go unpunished, and they fixed it on the cardinal Aldobrandin, the counsellor of the pope. One of them resolved to poison him and made several efforts to introduce himself into his kitchens. His urgency in presenting himself day after day to be admitted into the palace, awakened suspicions, and soldiers were posted to arrest him. As usual, the Jesuit came to offer his services to the domestics of the cardinal Aldobrandin, to assist them in their labours, and as he was about to enter, two sbirri arrested him. Being strong and vigorous, he hurled them to the earth, and before they had time to obtain aid, he fled and threw himself into the residence of the cardinal Odoardo Farnese, a zealous protector of the disciples of Ignatius Loyola. The prefect of Rome went at once with soldiers to the residence of the Farnese to claim the fugitive; but instead of obeying, the cardinal and his people appeared with arms at the windows, fired on the prefect, and compelled him to retreat. The resistance lasted for several days; finally, as his holiness was preparing to introduce troops from without to maintain his authority, Farnese sallied with his people through the rear of his palace, gained the country and retired into the superb castle which his uncle had built, thirty-six miles from Rome.

Clement, exasperated by the audacity of the Jesuits and the Farnese, threatened the first with a dissolution of their order, and despatched the governor of the city to inform the cardinal that he must surrender the government of the patrimony of his ancestors, of which he showed himself unworthy. Farnese refused to obey, and prepared to sustain a siege in his castle against the papal troops. Very fortunately for him his brother interfered in the quarrel, and went in all haste to cast himself at the feet of his holiness to obtain the pardon of the cardinal. The pope appeared to yield to the entreaties of the duke and granted Farnese permission to return to Rome; but scarcely had he crossed its gates, when he was arrested and conducted to the castle of San Angelo. The Jesuits in their turn came to the aid of their protector, and on the 5th of March, 1605, Clement died of poison.

This pontiff terminates worthily the series of popes of the sixteenth century, who disputed the ground of their spiritual and temporal omnipotence, foot by foot, and by force of ruses, deceits, crimes, and outrages, caused the tiara to triumph in the midst of the political and religious revolutions which overwhelmed all nations, and threatened to engulf the ship of St. Peter.

THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

LEO THE ELEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTIETH POPE.

Considerations on the history of the papacy in the seventeenth century—Intrigues in the conclave after the death of Clement the Eighth—Henry the Fourth gives large sums to have a pope appointed who was favourable to him—Alexander Octavian de Medicis is chosen sovereign pontiff—His plans of reform—He testifies extreme contempt for the kings of France and Spain—His hatred for the Jesuits—He dies after a reign of twenty-six days.

It is an incontestable truth, that after the apparition of the great Reformation in the sixteenth century, the papacy would have been overthrown, and the formidable power of the bishops of Rome for ever annihilated, if kings, instead of defending the theocracy against the people, had been content with exercising in their own dominions an authority sanctioned by justice. Unfortunately, they thought their interests compromised by the development of the principles of the Reformation; they persecuted to the utmost the men who endeavoured to make it triumph; and as they were the strongest, they could at their ease murder, cause rivers of blood to flow, and pile up mountains of dead bodies; and the tiara remained exalted.

The sovereigns, however, in lending their aid to the popes, and in saving them from certain ruin, imposed on them as conditions, that they should stop interfering directly in political transactions, that they should no longer dictate their wishes on empires, and that they should assist them in spreading around men the shades of ignorance, so as to render their sway easier. Pressed by circumstances, the bishops of Rome submitted; from that time they lost the immense influence they had acquired, and were hereafter only the servants of kings. The Vatican was mute, and instead of lancing its thunders against those who braved it, as it had formerly done, it merely uttered a murmur like that of volcanoes which accumulate lava and have not strength enough to produce an eruption.

During the seventeenth century the popes were only occupied in Machiavelian intrigues, executed but perfidies, only framed schemes; they committed no more great crimes in the face of day, they performed cowardly assassinations in the dark; they were no longer addicted to revels, they became crowned hypocrites.

We should, however, say that the venerable pontiff who opened the series of popes in this century, carried to the chair of the apostle precious virtues, which should hinder us from confounding him with his successors; and that he would doubtless have merited well of mankind, if the priests had not stopped him at the moment he was about to undertake radical and important reforms among the clergy.

After the funeral of Clement the Eighth, the victim of the vengeance of the Jesuits, his nephew, the cardinal Aldobrandin, who had been accustomed to reign in the name of the pontiff, thought himself still in a state to command, and was desirous of having one of his creatures chosen pope, so as to perpetuate for himself the exercise of ecclesiastical omnipotence. Sustained by the French faction, he boldly attacked the Spanish cardinals, who had a majority in the conclave, and openly proposed, as a candidate, the cardinal Baronius, the celebrated annalist of the church. The gentlemen ushers, who were sold to Philip the Third, having rejected this prelate on the ground that he was an enemy of the king of Spain, the cardinal de Joyeuse, the head of the French faction, who was very anxious to choose a pontiff who was favourable to Henry the Fourth, and who had received from that prince large sums to buy up votes in the conclave, commenced making overtures to the cardinals Montalto and Sforza, purchased their defection, and proposed as a candidate Alexander Octavian, cardinal of Florence. These prelates not only approved of his choice, but even undertook to induce Aldobrandin to make a good bargain with his protege. In fact, some hours afterwards, the nephew of Clement the Eighth made a treaty with Montalto, and accompanied him to the cell of Alexander Octavian, who was saluted as pope, by the name of Leo the Eleventh, on the 1st of April, 1605.

The news of this election was received with great displeasure by the court of Madrid, but, as a compensation, it excited transports of joy in that of France.

For a moment the people hoped that they were about to taste the sweetness of an evangelical reign, under a good pope. Leo the Eleventh commenced by driving from the Vatican, the flatterers and courtiers who encumbered the ante chambers; he then announced his intention to reform the church, to destroy the two execrable orders of Jesuits and Dominicans, and had even prepared a promotion of venerable ecclesiastics, whom he wished to create cardinals to assist him in his labours; he had already suppressed a part of the imposts with which his predecessors had surcharged the provinces. Every thing presaged an era of prosperity and tolerance for the nations; but the assassins of Sixtus the Fifth and Clement the Eighth, were watching the pontiff, and none of his magnificent plans were to be realised.

Though surrounded by dangerous enemies, the intrepid Leo had the courage to refuse the alliance of the king of France, which the cardinal de Joyeuse offered him, in exchange for some unjust concessions, and replied to him, "Your Henry the Fourth is a hypocrite, without faith or loyalty; I will not do what he asks, for it would be contrary to justice. Write to him that we will never sacrifice our duty to the vile interests of a dynasty, and that he is very much deceived in supposing we could be deceived by the glitter of gold as some of our predecessors have been."

In an almost similar circumstance, his holiness made the same reply to the ambassadors of Philip the Third, king of Spain, and loudly blamed his cowardly submission to the Jesuits. As was seen, it became necessary for the disciples of Ignatius Loyola to rid themselves of such a pope; thus he died poisoned, on the 27th of April, 1605, after a reign of twenty-six days.

PAUL THE FIFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1605.]

Electoral intrigues—Paul the Fifth is proclaimed sovereign pontiff—His history before occupying the pontifical throne—He distributes all the offices and dignities of the church to his relatives—His holiness undertakes to reduce all the states of Italy beneath his sway—He excommunicates the Venetians—The most serene republic drives the Jesuits out of its territories—Peace between the republic and the Holy See—The Jesuits in England—The gunpowder plot—Punishment of Fathers Garnet and Oldecorn—The oath of allegiance—Paul the Fifth orders the English Catholics to refuse to obey the king—James the First enters into a polemical controversy with the pope—Doctrines of the Jesuits about regicide—Assassination of Henry the Fourth—Punishment of Ravillac—Parliament condemns the works of the Jesuits to be burned by the executioner—The regent protects the Jesuits—Condemnation of Doctor Edmund Richer—Religious congregations in France—Publication of the decrees of the council of Trent—The Huguenots take up arms—Treaty of Douun—Paul the Fifth causes Mark Antony Dominis, the author, to be poisoned—Obscene disputes between the Dominicans and Franciscans on the conception of the Virgin—Nepotism and incests of Paul the Fifth—His death.

FIFTY-NINE cardinals entered into the conclave on the death of Leo, and formed four parties; Aldobrandin was at the head of the most numerous; Montalto directed the operations of the second coterie, which numbered twenty-one cardinals; the third was that of the Spaniards, and the fourth of the French.

Baronius, as in the last conclave, was nominated, and lent himself so much to the movement, that he brought over several cardinals to his party, and could for a moment, flatter himself with the hope of triumphing over his competitors; but at the moment when they were preparing to enter one of the chapels to collect the votes, fifteen of his partizans went over to the cardinal Tosco, one of the richest prelates of the court of Rome, who by this defection, was enabled to count on forty-four votes.

They were already proceeding to the ceremony of adoration, says Nicholas de Marbais, when Baronius, irritated at seeing the tiara escape him, uttered these words in a loud voice:—"Do you then wish to choose for your head a wretch who cannot utter a sentence without accompanying it with an obscene oath? Do you wish then, by choosing a man of abominable morals as pontiff, to draw the reprobation of the people of Spain, Italy, and France, on the see of Rome, and increase the repulsion, already so great, with which we inspire the nations?" This rally threw the members of the conclave into great perplexity, and prevented the election of Tosco; it did not, however, bring back to the cardinal Baronius, the suffrages he had lost. During the night Aldobrandin had an interview with Montalto and the cardinal de Joyeuse, and in the morning, having gone to the Sixtine chapel with their partizans, they proclaimed the cardinal Camillus Borghese pope, before the Spaniards knew that he had even been proposed as a candidate.

The new pontiff was a Roman by birth, and of a family originally from Sienna; he had first exercised the profession of a lawyer, he had then entered on an ecclesiastical career, and obtained, successively, the dignity of vice legate of Bologna, auditor of the chamber, vicar of the pope, and grand inquisitor; finally, he had been promoted by Clement the Eighth to the title of cardinal of St. Chrysogonus.

As he had kept himself constantly aloof from political affairs, and appeared to desire to live in tranquillity, the leaders of the different parties thought it would be easy for them to govern the church in the name of the holy father, and all came to offer him their services. But it turned out differently from their expectations; he declared that he alone would reign, and to take from the cardinals all hopes that he would re-consider his deci-son, he formed a council from among the members of his own family. He gave a cardinal's hat to the young Scipio Caffarelli, one of his nephews; he confided to his two brothers, Francis and John Baptist Borghese, the most important employments, and gave them, besides, the government of the Vatican and of the castle of San Angelo; he provided all his other relatives with rich benefices, and installed them about his person. He was then occupied in the government of the Holy See, and showed that he had preserved the ancient traditions of the Roman church, and was disposed, if allowed to act, to revive the pretensions of the popes to absolute sway over Italy.

Contrary to every principle of right, he interfered in the affairs of the kingdom of Naples, and excommunicated the regent Ponte, who commanded there in the name of Philip, because he had sent to the galleys an ecclesiastic who was guilty of a capital crime.—He then sent apostolic nuncios to Charles Emmanuel, duke of Savoy, to inform him, not to confer in future any vacant benefices without the approval of the court of Rome; which was an odious act of arbitrary power, since the popes, his predecessors, had sold this right to the dukes of Savoy, and it was impossible to deny the authenticity of the bulls issued on this subject. He then pushed his audacity so far, as to interdict the republics of Lucca, Genoa, and Venice, and all the states of Italy, from making any treaty either among themselves or with foreign powers, without his sanction; and to prevent all hesitation about it, he fulminated a bull in which he enjoined on sovereign princes, and the chiefs of the republics, to prohibit their people from opening any intercourse with foreigners, under penalty of ecclesiastical censures.

The threat produced its effect; none of the Italian governments being willing to break with the Holy See, all conformed to the orders of the pope. Genoa revoked its orders against the Jesuits, and authorised the members of the society to concur in the elections for the different civil and military employments.—Lucca accepted the bulls of his holiness without examination; the duke of Savoy also submitted in the transmission of benefices; the king of Spain himself permitted the regent of Naples to make concessions to the court of Rome, to have his excommunication raised; the Venetians alone refused to obey the holy father, and a struggle took place between them and Paul the Fifth.

The redoubtable council of Ten had condemned to death an Augustine monk, guilty of a rape and an outrage on the chastity of a young girl, ten years old, whom he had then murdered; they had, moreover, proceeded against a canon of Vicenza, called Scipio Saracino, accused of having entered by night, with masked men, into the residence of one of his relatives, and of having committed violence on her; still further, the doge of Venice, of his own authority, had incarcerated the count Brandolino Valdemarino, abbot of Narvesa, who was accused of having poisoned his father and several of his domestics, of living in incest with his sister, of robbing travellers on the highway, and of having committed several assassinations on youths whom he had polluted by means of stupifying drugs.

His holiness maintained that these great criminals were beyond the reach of the vengeance of the laws, on account of their sacred character; that the republic had violated ecclesiastical immunities, by judging them by a tribunal of laymen, and ordered the doge to place at once in the hands of the apostolic nuncio, the Augustine monk, the canon of Vicenza, and the abbot of Narvesa, under penalty of excommunication. Paul the Fifth even took advantage of this affair to claim the repeal of a law which prohibited priests from acquiring real estate without the authority of the senate, and which compelled them to sell lands or houses acquired as a heritage from their relatives. He also demanded the abolition of the decrees which prohibited the building of new churches, and the founding of hospitals or religious communities, without the concurrence of the civil power.

The senate represented to the court of Rome, that by virtue of the ancient institutions of the republic, and the privileges which had been sold or granted by the sovereign pontiffs, his predecessors, they were permitted to promulgate edicts concerning the civil relations of ecclesiastics with the state, and that the Holy See could not, without a manifest violation of established rights, demand the overthrow of their laws, nor the submission of criminals to its jurisdiction. The pope replied, that canonical ordinances were divine laws, and that the successors of the apostle had no more right than other men to contravene them; and that consequently the permissions granted to the Venetians by his predecessors were annulled. His holiness seeing that his threats of excommunication did not intimidate the most serene republic, thought of reviving pretensions forgotten for many ages, of duties collected from the islands of the Adriatic by the Holy See, in order to control the action of its government. He, moreover, exempted from imposts the rich benefices which the cardinals, the knights of Malta, the convents of men, the mendicant orders, and all ecclesiastics possessed in the territory of the republic, on the ground of their being subjects of the Roman court. Not content with striking this blow at the finances of the Venetians, he endeavoured to injure their commerce and industry, by prohibiting all works which issued from their presses, even missals and breviaries; finally, he lanced an excommunication against the doge and senate, and placed the city of Venice, as well as its islands in the Adriatic, and all its possessions on terra firma, under interdict.

The most serene republic no longer restrained its conduct towards the court of Rome, and replied to the attacks by a decree which prohibited ecclesiastics, under the most severe penalties, from setting up the bull of the holy father, or from ceasing from divine service in any church. All the Venetian clergy obeyed, the Jesuits alone declared that their conscience did not permit them to act contrary to the orders of the pope, and asked permission to leave the dominions of the republic, which the doge readily granted them. The senator Quirino, and the celebrated Fra Paolo Sarpi then appealed from the judgment of the court of Rome to the tribunal of nations, spreading through all countries works filled with close and powerful reasoning, in which they attacked the temporal authority the popes had arrogated to themselves over the world, as the successors of the apostle Peter. His holiness was alarmed at the consequences which might result to him from this strife, and instructed the cardinals Bellarmine and Baronius, the two pillars of the church, to reply to the enemies of the court of Rome and to silence them.

Like skilful men, the two prelates shifted the question; they were careful how they discussed with princes and kings the authority which they exercised over the people, from fear lest their own arguments should be turned against them. They only established the principle that despotism proceeded from God, and that mankind were bound to submit, without examination, to those who possessed the sovereign power; then, introducing metaphysics into their discussion, they proclaimed the predominance of spirit over matter, and deduced from it these singular propositions:—

“The spirit directs and moderates the flesh, but not reciprocally; therefore, the temporal power is not permitted to elevate itself above the spiritual, to wish to direct it, to command or to oppress it; this would be rebellion, a tyranny entirely pagan. It is for the priest to judge the emperor, and not the emperor the priest, for it would be absurd to contend that the flock should guide the shepherd.”

Fra Paolo and the senator Quirino, far from regarding themselves as conquered, entered on the battle on this ground; thus like their adversaries, they proclaimed that all power emanated from God, and taking as their point of departure, the doctrines concerning royalty which were professed in France, they concluded from them, that the authority of the prince having the same source as that of the pope, the latter had no right to interfere in the affairs of government.

“The ecclesiastics of different kingdoms,” added they, “as well as the laity, are submitted to the power of princes, and none of their subjects can dispense with rendering to them the same reverence that is due to the divinity. A king has a right to make laws, render judgments, and establish imposts without any control. The pope also possesses a supreme jurisdiction over the people, but it is purely spiritual, as Christ himself has instituted it. The Son of God having never exercised any temporal jurisdiction during his life, could not transmit to St. Peter and his successors a right he had never claimed. . .” Such were the singular pretensions and extravagant theories, which the satellites of the papacy and monarchy endeavoured to make prevalent, so as to acquire a right to oppress the people.

They soon came from this war of words to a real war; Paul the Fifth sought for allies every where, assembled his troops, and announced that he was going to annihilate Venice. But his warlike ardour did not last long; whether he feared to expose his army to the risk of a defeat, which would have greatly compromised his power in Italy, or whether he feared he could not support the expenses of a campaign and the maintenance of his troops, or whether he suspected that Philip the Third and Henry the Fourth, whilst appearing officially to desire the maintenance of peace between Rome and Venice, were secretly employed in prolonging hostilities, he feigned to yield to the remonstrances of the French ambassadors, and accepted their mediation in his quarrel with the republic.

The Venetians, who had need of peace for their commercial prosperity, listened favourably to the terms of arrangement proposed by the Holy See. Paul demanded that the seignory, or council of Ten, should place in the hands of the French ambassadors the three ecclesiastical prisoners detained in the dungeons of the republic, and that the senate should also repeal the decree passed against the introduction of the bulls of the court of Rome, and should send him an embassy, in sign of submission, to solicit the absolution of the ecclesiastical censures. His holiness wished also to exact the recall of the Jesuits, but he was obliged to forego it, the doge Lodovico Donato having declared that he would rather break off the negotiations and continue the war, than suffer one of the disciples of Loyola on the territory of the republic. Peace was concluded between the two powers, and the Jesuits remained exiled.

If the society lost a little of its power in a corner of Italy, it resumed a part of its former influence in Great Britain, and notwithstanding the severe ordinances of Queen Elizabeth, the good fathers were not afraid to reappear in the kingdom, and even to found colleges. Their security arose from the fact, that the new king of England, James the First, the son of Mary Stuart, showed great kindness to them; but their audacity increased so much, that the sovereign was compelled to be severe on some of the greatest mischief-makers among them.

They then swore vengeance, and organised with some Catholic gentlemen whose consciences they directed; amongst others, Robert Catesby and Thomas Piercy, a plot which consisted in nothing less than blowing up the hall of parliament, when the king and royal family were assisting at the opening of the session. It was agreed among the conspirators, that only a small number of faithful and determined men should be admitted into the plot. They first associated with them a young Catholic gentleman, named Thomas Winter, whom they sent on a mission to Flanders, after one of their friends named Fawkes, who was in the service of Spain, and whose ardent zeal for the papacy they knew. The latter returned at once to England on their invitation, but when he discovered that it was to annihilate at a single blow, so great a number of victims, he hesitated to enter into the plot, and represented to the reverend fathers who directed the matter, that on the day of the opening of the session of parliament, there would be almost as many Catholics as heretics present, and that they would have to answer to God for the death of their brethren. The Jesuits Garnet, Oldecorn, Tesmond, and Gerard replied, that if the number of the orthodox was only one less than that of the heretics, they could proceed and annihilate them all together, and that God would absolve them on account of the great glory that would accrue to him.

His conscience thus assured, Fawkes associated himself in the work with his companions. Piercy hired a house adjoining the parliament buildings, and all began to make a mine which was to reach beneath the hall, in which the sessions of parliament were held. They had already pierced through several walls, and according to their calculation were at but a small distance from the hall, when one night, while they were at work, they heard, above their heads, a loud talking and an unusual movement. Not knowing to what cause to attribute this hubbub, and fearing lest their plans were suspected, the conspirators stopped their work, and left the mine in order to inform themselves of what was going on. They learned that workmen were emptying a cellar filled with oil, which was situated beneath the chamber of peers, in order to rent it. The opportunity was siezed, and the next day the cellar belonged to the conspirators; they carried into it by night thirty-six barrels of powder, which they covered over with faggots and billets of wood.

Things being thus arranged, they waited patiently for the opening of parliament; the time for the royal session had been already fixed, and nothing could make the plot miscarry, when Lord Monteagle, a Catholic member of the chamber of peers, received an anonymous letter, advising him and his friends not to be present at that session, since a terrible blow would be inevitably struck, and which would occupy less time than it would take him to burn the letter which warned him of it. Lord Monteagle paid no attention to the last recommendation of his mysterious correspondent, and sent the letter to Lord Salisbury, the secretary of state, who attached no great importance to it; he, however, submitted it to the king, who thought otherwise. His majesty thought that the words "terrible and sudden blow," alluded to the effects of gunpowder, and gave orders to examine all the vaults which were beneath the halls of parliament. The earl of Suffolk, who, in his capacity of lord chamberlain, was charged with this duty, caused all the cellars to be opened, and having remarked in that of Piercy a mass of faggots and billets of wood, asked what was the name of the tenant of the cellar; on the reply of Fawkes, who was disguised as a valet, he remarked that the supply seemed very large for the wants of a single man who did not reside habitually in London. He then left it, but scarcely had he got out, when he sent back Sir Thomas Knyvet, a magistrate, with some soldiers, to make a close examination. Before entering it, the latter arrested the pretended domestic of Piercy, on whom were found matches and a tinder box; the firewood being thrown aside, the thirty-six barrels of powder were discovered.

Fawkes was at once put to the torture, and forced to name all his accomplices. Catesby, Piercy, and several others of the conspirators, had, however, time to leave London and reach Warwickshire, where Sir Edward Digby, full of confidence in the success of the enterprise, had assembled some partizans, and was making dispositions to seize the young princess Elizabeth, the daughter of the king, whom they wished to place on the throne. But the news of their fatal conspiracy had already been transmitted to the sheriff, with orders to assemble the militia and seize the guilty; then, finding that it was impossible to resist or fly, they assembled to the number of twenty-four, in a fortified castle in Warwickshire, resolved to die with arms in their hands. Unfortunately, at the moment of the attack, their supply of powder took fire, and they were unable to defend themselves against the royal troops. Catesby and Piercy killed themselves; the others were made prisoners and perished on the scaffold.

The Jesuit Henry Garnet, who had celebrated mass for the success of this great enterprise, and the Jesuit Oldecorn, whose duty it was to recruit conspirators, both, the chiefs and organisers of the plot, were judged by a royal court, with several other disciples of Loyola, and condemned to the gibbet.

This affair determined King James to make his subjects take the famous oath of allegiance, by which they recognised that the sovereign of Great Britain was independent of every foreign power; that neither pope, nor archbishop, nor bishop could depose him, nor free his subjects from the oath of fidelity they had sworn to him; that none had a right to seize on his domains, nor dispose of his kingdom, nor make an attempt on his life; that the doctrine professed by the Catholics, which authorised subjects to put to death their princes on the order of the pope, was impious and execrable. This oath was made obligatory on all the inhabitants of England, no matter what were their religious opinions.

Paul the Fifth immediately addressed several briefs to the faithful in Great Britain, to prohibit them from obeying the king; which caused banishment to be inflicted on some, and even decapitation on the most obstinate.

James the First was not content with combatting the satellites of the papacy with the axe of the executioner; he took up the pen and attacked the doctrines of Cardinal Bellarmine in several controversial works. The Jesuit Suarez replied to the monarch, and placing himself as the adversary of royalty, and the champion of the papacy, endeavoured to crush his adversary beneath a flux of incoherent words and extravagant propositions. "The sovereign power," says he in his book, "is all-powerful to direct kings efficaciously in the exercise of their authority; he can also constrain princes to obey him, in that which he has justly ordained, and to punish those who do not obey him; for he is armed with a two-edged sword. And the proof that this right has devolved on him is, that the chiefs of the church have always used it, in excommunicating emperors and kings, in deposing them, in freeing their subjects from their oaths of fidelity, and in giving their dominions to Catholic princes. The popes are invested with a power so great, that their decrees of death pronounced against a king, are enough to place the condemned beyond the protection of the law; all the faithful, however, are not authorised to fall upon the enemy of the church, and they should leave the care of executing the sentence to those who are charged with it."

Another Jesuit, named Emmanuel Sa, took part in these disputes, and even improved upon the propositions of Suarez; he maintained that the revolt of an ecclesiastic against a king did not constitute a crime of lese-majesty, since priests could not be regarded as subjects of a king. That it was the same with laymen, when the prince was under a canonical condemnation, and that in this case all the faithful should unite to combat the tyrant, and make religion to triumph.

The Jesuit Delrio expressed still more openly his hatred for kings: "Why can I not," he exclaimed in one of his sermons, "make a libation to God of the blood of a king? Never did the altar of Jesus Christ hold a more beautiful liquor; never could a more agreeable holocaust be offered. Let him be blest to the most remote ages who plunges a dagger into the heart of a king. . . ."

These furious discourses and exaggerated doctrines were not directed against James the First alone; the Jesuits wished to strike down all the princes of Christendom, and his holiness seconded them in this new crusade, by authorising the propagation of a work of the celebrated Mariana, in which regicide was imposed as a principle, a duty, an obligation, when the sovereign freed himself from the obedience due to the chief of the church. After the example of the Spanish Jesuit, the good fathers who resided in France, exalted the pontifical authority, and sought to abase royalty. "Obey, children of Christ," exclaimed the furious Clarus Bonarscius in his sermons, "blindly obey that power which has restored Henry the Fourth to the society of the faithful; do not listen to those who maintain that the pope has no power to excommunicate the king of France; he has done it, however, and that prince has recognised that he had the power, since he has humbled himself in the dust, in order to be absolved. What! were the sovereign to become an Arius, a Vallus, a Nestorius, a Manes or Mahomet in speech and with the sword; should he become a Jew, should he be circumcised, would not the pope have power to act against him? Were he to renew the horrible cruelty of Phalaris against all the zealous Catholics of France, and could the pope do nothing to him? God preserve us from this thought. The pontiff should employ his axe for the safety of France, and cut down the large trunks which threaten to stifle the young trees." Then arose Ravillac; either the declamations of the Jesuits had acted powerfully upon a sick brain, or else the man had been urged on by his own exaltation or by a hidden cause which l'Estoile, Sully, and the marshal d'Estrées do not fear to cast upon the queen, as this fanatic waited to strike the king until Mary of Medicis had been proclaimed regent, and solemnly crowned. Francis Ravillac had arrived from Angoulême at Paris three weeks before, waiting to put his regicidal plan into execution. On the 14th of May, 1610, the eve of the day fixed for the departure of the king, after having heard mass at St. Benedict, he dined very tranquilly at his inn with his host and a merchant named Cottelet; he then went to the Louvre to wait for the king. At four o'clock, Henry left his palace in a carriage to visit the triumphal arches erected in honour of the regent, who was to make her entry into the capital on the next day. He was accompanied by the dukes d'Epemon and Montbazon, the marshals de la Force, de Roquelaure and de Lavardin, the first squire de Liancourt, and the marquis de Mirabeau; a small number of gentlemen and valets on foot alone escorted the king, the duke d'Epemon having given an order to the guard to remain at the Louvre.

When the carriage arrived in the street de la Ferronière, which was at that period very narrow, the cortege was stopped by a crowd of carts; most of the foot valets went into the cemetery of the Innocents so as to get on more at their ease, and there remained but two near the carriage; it was precisely at this moment that the duke d'Epemon opened the window by the king, and asked him to examine a very important piece of writing. Whilst his majesty was engaged in reading it, Ravillac, who had followed the carriage, leaped upon the axle of the wheel and struck the king two blows with his knife in the region of the heart, and so rapidly that none would have suspected what was going on but for a groan from Henry; the death was instantaneous. The assassin could no doubt have easily escaped by gliding among the vehicles; but he remained there, with his knife in his hand, boasting how well he had struck; he was then arrested and conducted to the hotel de Retz, where the provost proceeded to a first examination.

This magistrate found on him a chaplet, a paper on which the name of Jesus was written three times on different folds, and a paste-board heart which he wore around his neck. We are really surprised in reading the examinations into this matter, at the particular care which the judges who had charge of the proceedings took to prevent Ravillac from exposing his accomplices. Though it was ascertained through the keeper of the inn that he had had intercourse with masqued persons, amongst others with a squire of the queen, with the almoners of the cardinal du Perron, one of the lovers of Mary of Medicis, with several Jesuits, a Cordelier, a Feuillant, the curate of St. Severin, and a canon, yet he was confronted with no one but Father d'Aubigny, who affirmed by oath that he did not know the assassin, and denied the allegations of Ravillac, who said that he had visited him at a house of the Jesuits.

Father Cotton, the confessor of Henry the Fourth, went himself several times to prohibit the accused from compromising persons of quality. Finally, thirteen days after the assassination, as if they were in a hurry to finish it, the parliament pronounced sentence of death against Francis Ravillac, attainted and convicted of the crime of lese-majesty. He was condemned to be pinched with red hot pincers, and have melted lead, boiling oil, and hot sulphur poured on the sores; to have his right hand burned to the wrist, then to be torn asunder, and then consumed on the scaffold. The judgment further provided that the house in which he was born should be demolished; that his mother and father should be driven from the kingdom, and be prohibited from returning to it, under penalty of being hung and strangled; that his brothers, sisters, uncles, and other relatives should be compelled, under similar penalties, to abandon the name of Ravillac and take some other.

The assassin underwent his horrible punishment courageously; he did not utter a groan whilst the executioner was tearing him with red hot pincers, which at each blow tore off strips of flesh; nor even whilst they were pouring into his gaping wounds a mixture of not lead, sulphur, oil, and boiling wax. No cry escaped him when his hand was burned, nor when he was fastened to the horses by his four limbs. Finally, after having undergone this frightful punishment for almost an hour without being dismembered, and still breathing, "the soldiers who assisted at the execution, tired of beholding it, fell upon the criminal with swords, knives, and clubs, and commenced striking, cutting, and tearing this unfortunate man, who was thus ardently cut into parts, and the pieces torn from the executioner and dragged in all directions with extreme fury."

When justice had been inflicted on the murderer, cold reason resumed the superiority, and they began to inquire who were the true accomplices of Ravillac; the public voice designated the Jesuits, and pamphlets against the reverend fathers appeared in every direction, and amongst others, one called "l'Anti-Cotton," in which it was demonstrated that the Jesuits and the queen had armed the hand of Ravillac.

The parliament, not daring to act against such great culprits, contented itself with enjoining on the faculty of theology, to censure the works published by the society on the theory of regicide; and in accordance with the decision of the doctors, condemned several of their books to be burned by the executioner on the Place de Grève. This judgment against the disciples of Loyola, by the first body in the kingdom, and which implied in some sort an accusation of participation in the assassination of Henry the Fourth, did not prevent Mary de Medicis from continuing her favours to them, and installing Father Cotton near the young Louis the Thirteenth, in the capacity of his confessor, and of giving to their college de la Flèche the heart of her husband. The queen even dared to grant them letters patent much more extensive than those hitherto granted them, and to permit them to give public instruction on theology, and all kinds of sciences, since, she declared, that it was most useful that children should learn from them the forms and modes of life which they must observe at court.

The Jesuits immediately afterwards informed the university of their letters patent, and were engaged in following up the grant before the parliament. Thus was revived the proceedings concerning the instruction of children, which had been pending for almost a century between the university and the Society of Jesus. In his pleading, the advocate la Martelière, who spoke for the university, recalled the fact that it was the third time that this celebrated body had claimed the protection of parliament against the satellites of the pope, in order to assure the repose of the kingdom; that since the establishment of the Jesuits all Europe had resounded with the noise of their disputes; that they had never ceased to preach the overthrow of the political powers; he cast upon them a participation in the crimes of Jacques Clement, de Barrière, de Chatel, and de Ravillac, in France; he recalled their participation in the gunpowder plot in England, in the troubles which had arisen in Venice and several other states, and finished his harangue by beseeching parliament not to be surprised by the hypocritical tone, honied words, and promises of the good fathers; he begged them to be on their guard against their knaveries, and not to forget that their own constitution authorised them to perjure themselves, whenever the interest of their order or that of the pope demanded it.

The advocate general, Servin, was also favourable to the university; that magistrate declared that before entering on the debate, he had inquired from the Jesuits if they were willing to agree as the terms of their re-establishment, "to sign without equivocation or subterfuges, the four propositions of the Sorbonne, concerning the inviolability of the persons of kings, the absolute independence of their authority in temporal matters, the subjection of ecclesiastics to princes, and the maintenance of the liberties of the Gallican church;" but that they had refused to give a formal adhesion to these principles. It was consequently concluded to prohibit the Jesuits from giving public lessons; to fill any scholasric function for the instruction of children or adults, in the city of Paris. The parliament admitted his conclusions, and made a decree declaring the university to be well founded in its remarks, and giving judgment for it. It was not in France only that the Jesuits had become objects of general animadversion; they were held in execration every where. They had been driven out of Russia; the university of Louvain had condemned their doctrines, and expelled them from Flanders; in Bohemia, a decree of the sovereign council, made by the consent of all orders in the kingdom, had condemned them to perpetual banishment, as disturbers of the public quiet; Moravia, following the example of Bohemia, had taken an energetic decision to prohibit them from entering its provinces. Then the Jesuits, chased, spit upon, disgraced, appeared to amend, and to obtain their re-installation, they renounced their regicidal doctrines, and adopted the maxim of the inviolability of the persons of sovereigns, which was naturally professed at the courts of those potentates. The fathers Balthazar, Jacquinot, Fronton, Jacques Sirmond, and Faconius, presented themselves at the bar of the parliament and declared that they accepted the four propositions of the Sorbonne, in regard to the preservation of the persons of kings, their absolute independence of the see of Rome, and the privileges of their authority, even over ecclesiastics.

This submission, though tardy, was very profitable to them, for it appeased the murmurs of their enemies, caused them to be tolerated in the kingdom, and placed them in a position to provoke ecclesiastical assemblies, in which they agitated different religious questions, which were all resolved to their entire satisfaction. Thus in the provincial councils of Aix and Sens, they obtained the condemnation of the treatise of Edmund Richer, syndic of the faculty of theology in Paris, concerning ecclesiastical power, and consequently his displacement from the syndicate. But this act of iniquity reawaked all the former hatred against the Jesuits, and the struggle commenced more violently than ever between them and the defenders of the liberties of the Gallic church.

The work of Edmund Richer became the cause of a polemical controversy, which gave it more vogue and renown than had ever been attained by any book; for, independently of the interest which a work laid under excommunication and interdict always inspires, the treatise on ecclesiastical power had the attraction for the masses, of a work in open hostility to the two great powers that crush the people; it demonstrated that neither kings nor pontiffs had the right of infallibility and inviolability which were attributed to them—that both, holding their authority from the nations, could, under no pretext, nor for any cause whatsoever, free themselves from their supreme jurisdiction.

All the great writers of the age adopted the opinion of the syndic, and took up the pen to sustain his doctrines. One of them, Du Plessis Mornay, even dared to attack the court of Rome, and published his celebrated work called "The Mysteries of Iniquity," in which the author unveiled the long sequence of crimes and infamies committed by the pontiffs, and in which he concluded by saying, that the successors of St. Peter had been the mandatories of antichrist. In the frontispiece of his book there was engraven a tower of Babel, an emblem of the Vatican, and on the first page, his holiness, Paul the Fifth, in the costume of Satan, leading his infernal legions of Jesuits to conquer the world.

When the pope was informed of the appearance of so terrible a work, he very naturally fulminated a bull of excommunication against Du Plessis Mornay, and solicited the interdiction of his book in France, as most heretical, most dangerous, contrary to the divine, natural, and canonical laws, to the writings of the holy fathers, to the observances of the Catholic church, to the ceremonies received and practised from all antiquity. The Jesuits undertook to pursue the work, and to the shame of the magistracy, they found judges who condemned it.

Encouraged by this success, the children of Ignatius Loyola, undertook to bring about a triumph of the pope in Venice, and to rid him of his most formidable adversary, the illustrious Peter Sarpi or Fra Paolo, which was his Dominican name, as they had done in France of Du Plessis Mornay. As, however, they did not expect to find in the council of Ten, judges as docile as those in France, they proceeded in another way, and attempted to assassinate him. Fra Paolo, warned by an anonymous advice of what was prepared against him, took extraordinary precautions to guarantee himself from attacks, and asked permission never to go abroad without a coat of mail under his robe, and accompanied by a lay brother of his monastery armed with a blunderbuss; this was granted him, a thing unheard-of in a city where the carrying of fire arms was punished by death. Nevertheless, one day, as he was leaving his convent, five masked men fell upon him, struck him several blows with their poniards, and escaped before the lay brother had time to use his fire arms. Peter Sarpi was carried back to his cell almost dead, and with his jaw pierced through with a stiletto, on which were engraven a tiara, a cross, and a death's head, with this motto, "In the name of the pope, the Society of Jesus."

Immediately on the report of this hateful attempt at assassination, the senators, who were in session, came in a body to the convent of the Dominicans to inquire into the situation of the wounded man; the council of Ten ordered the most active search to be made for the guilty, who unfortunately could not be arrested. He brought the most famous surgeon of Italy from Padua, at the expense of the state, to attend on Fra Paolo, and when his health was restored, the most serene republic doubled his pension, and offered him a palace. Peter Sarpi, though very sensible of these proofs of such general interest, refused the pensions and the palaces, he only consented never to leave his convent but with an escort, so as to be beyond the reach of a new attempt at assassination.

The Jesuits, forced to renounce their guilty plans, and despairing of being enabled to subjugate Venice to the Holy See, so long as it had such a defender, fell back on France, and aided by the regent Mary de Medicis and Father Cotton, her confessor, they organised religious congregations in all parts of the kingdom, which enveloped the cities and country in an immense net of superstition. All the old orders of monks reappeared; Dominicans, Benedictines, Franciscans, Carmelites, Jacobins, Feuillants, recruited numerous adepts, and covered all France with their legions. Port Royal became a religious community, where they adored the consecrated host day and night; the sisters of Calvary passed the nights at the foot of the cross to expiate the offences committed by the protestants against the Tree of Life and Safety; nuns had extacies, after the example of St. Catherine of Sienna. Francis de Sales founded the order of the Visitation; the Ursulines monopolised the instruction of young girls, as the Jesuits had already done that of young men; Bellule instituted the priests of the oratory; the Benedictines reassembled at the congregation of St. Maur; Vincent de Paul founded the congregation of Missions; the Brothers of Mercy multiplied to infinity, and were endowed with vast domains, or rich communities, and the provinces were at the mercy of this monkish brood, who, in every country, and at all periods, have devoured the wealth of the people, paralyzed the development of industry, and rendered the human race besotted.

At last, the Jesuits thought themselves strong enough to brave public opinion, and by the order of Paul the Fifth, they induced the regent to convene the states-general, and to propose the adopting of the canons of the council of Trent, which were an outrage on the liberty of the church and the dignity of the country. The members of the nobility, who formed a part of the states, as well as several of the clergy, were favourable to the plan, and bargained away the national dignity. A bishop even dared to declare, in order to influence the deliberations of the commons, that there was no safety for the kingdom, unless the three orders decreed the submission of France to the will of the pope.

The commons, nevertheless, who had a reasonable distrust of the two privileged orders, resisted the solicitations. Through the provost of the merchants, as their organ, they remonstrated with the regent, and represented to her "that the question of the council of Trent having been in suspense for sixty years, they did not judge it to be a fitting time to settle it; that, moreover, the decisions of this pretended orthodox assembly had been recognised as derogatory to the royal authority and the public tranquillity; that the parliament had already decided that they should be subjected, since they subjected the chapters and monasteries to the bishops, and destroyed the independence of the regular clergy; since they confiscated, for the benefit of the pope, the fiefs of lords who were killed in duels; and they erased the indults of parliament and the jurisdiction of subaltern judges in matters in which ecclesiastics were interested; and, finally, because they introduced into France the horrible tribunals of the inquisition on the same basis as those of Spain."

The Jesuits, finding it impossible to overcome the repugnance of the commons, applied to the young king, who had obtained his majority, and obtained from him authority to hold provincial synods, to decide the important question of the ordinances made by the council of Trent, and their promulgation in France. A meeting of members of the clergy and nobility was held, who bound themselves, by oath, to make the cause of the pope triumph, and to constrain the nation to bow before the theocratic yoke. Among the fanatics who assisted at this cabal, were the cardinals de Rochefoucauld, de Gondy and du Peron, seven archbishops, and forty-five bishops, and among these last, was the proud prelate of Lucon, afterwards the cardinal de Richelieu. This audacity of the clergy and the Catholic nobility made a great noise, and compelled the chatelet of Paris to prohibit, by a decree, all ecclesiastics under his jurisdiction, to publish any thing which was treated of at the council of Trent, or which made the slightest innovation on the policy of the Gallican church, under penalty of confiscation and seizure.

The Huguenots also issued a manifesto, and declared that they would again take up arms, if the king wished to make France subject to the Holy See. Hostilities had already commenced on several points, when the marshal d'Ancre, the husband of Elionora Galigai, the favourite of the queen mother, interfered and induced Mary de Medicis to renounce the adoption of the council of Trent, and to promise the Huguenots that things should remain as formerly, regardless of the demands of the court of Rome or the clergy. Notwithstanding this solemn engagement, made by the queen mother, and the formal prohibition of the chatelet, the cardinals de Sourdis and de Rochefoucauld went on, assembled their own synods of Bourdeaux and Sens, and declared that the faithful should be bound to observe, conscientiously, the different rules of the holy council of Trent. Other prelates followed their example, and promulgated the decrees of this pretended œumenical assembly in their dioceses.

This singular triumph, obtained in defiance of the opposition of the parliament and the states-general, exalted the audacity of the Jesuits, and induced the good fathers to proclaim that France had adopted the council of Trent and submitted to the omnipotence of the pontiff. A remarkable work against the primacy of the pope, and called "The Ecclesiastical Republic," from the pen of the celebrated author Mark Antony Dominis, then appeared. His holiness was much moved by the appearance of this work, and immediately demanded its condemnation in France by the faculty of theology. At the same time, he entered into a conference with the author, and caused a cardinal's hat to be offered him, if he should consent to retract the propositions which should be pointed out to him in his book.

Dominis, seduced by the brilliant promises of the pope, was mean enough to make an apology, and disavow all he had written against the head of the church; he then went to Rome, fortified with a safe conduct, to receive the promised reward. But once in the power of the pope, after he had furnished to the world the shame of a second abjuration, instead of being elevated to the rank of a prince of the church, he was conducted to the castle of San Angelo and poisoned, after a captivity of five days. His holiness was not satisfied with this severe punishment of Dominis. For the edification of the faithful, he treated him as a relapsed heretic, and burned his body as well as his book, in the square of Flora. This proscription extended not only to the books which attacked the pope directly, but also against those which were written against the satellites of the Holy See, and even against historical works. Thus the court of Rome fulminated a sentence of excommunication against the advocate Arnaud for his memoir of the Jesuits, against the illustrious president De Thou for his history of France, and against the members of parliament for the decrees they had made in the affairs of the regicides Jean Chatel and Ravillac.

During this crusade against literary men, the Dominicans and Franciscans were scandalising Spain and Europe by their cynical disputes about the immaculate conception of the Virgin; and things reached such a point, that it was no longer with the pen that these monks attacked each other, but with blows of the stiletto or poniard. In France these events attracted public attention very little, which was fastened upon matters of much graver importance. The marshal d'Ancre had been assassinated by order of the king; his wife, Eleonora Galigai, had been beheaded by a decree of parliament; the queen mother disgraced, and with her Richelieu, the bishop of Lucern, one of her lovers. The blow of state directed against Mary de Medicis in the person of her favourites, had a great influence on the internal policy of the state. Father Cotton, confessor of the king, was driven from the court, which he governed with the Jesuits, and Richelieu himself, who filled the post of secretary of state, was banished for the same cause. The wary prelate retired to the city of Avignon, and connected himself intimately with the vice legate of the pope, to bring about the means of his return to France. The latter induced his holiness to demand the reinstatement of the bishop of Lucern in his post of secretary of state; but the duke de Luynes, who had the exercise of the supreme authority in his hands, and who feared the ambition of Richelieu, rejected all the overtures made to him on the subject. The prelate then took other means to attain his end. He entered into a correspondence with the queen mother, and induced her to escape from court and throw herself into the southern provinces, so as to excite a civil war, which took place. In this extremity the duke de Luynes, who knew the influence of Richelieu over Mary de Medicis, was forced, in order to arrest hostilities, to enter into an arrangement with that prelate, and proposed to him a reinstatement in his post of secretary of state, with the hat of a cardinal, if he would induce the queen to conclude a treaty of peace with her son; and as proof of the sincerity of his offers, he sent to the marquis de Creuvres, the French ambassador at Rome, an order to solicit publicly the entrance of the bishop of Lucern into the sacred college.

Richelieu, not suspecting that they would dare to strive with him in craft, trusted to the protestations of the court, and decided his royal mistress to become reconciled with Louis the Thirteenth. But when the treaty was signed, the duke de Luynes, who had no intention of bringing so able a man into the council of the king, refused to keep his engagements in regard to the post of secretary of state, and also wrote confidentially to the pope not to pay any regard to the solicitations of the French ambassador for a hat for the bishop of Lucern. His holiness abandoned the cause of his protegee the more readily, as he thought it was impossible for him to render him any service in consequence of his disgrace, and of the agreement of the queen with the court. A promotion of eight cardinals took place at Rome, and Richelieu was not among them. Furious at having been the dupe of Paul the Fifth, the king, and the duke de Luynes, the bishop of Lucern swore to be avenged. He excited Mary de Medicis to recommence the war on the pretence that the treaty of Angouleme was not executed, and at the same time he wrote to the pope, that he would make the court of Rome repent having associated with his enemies, and that he would break for ever with the policy of the Holy See. This threat produced no sensation at the court of the pontiff; never perhaps had the authority of the successors of St. Peter been so powerful as then, and the wrath of a prelati cal lover of a decayed queen was of little consequence to Paul the Fifth.

His holiness did not even reply to Richelieu, and was engaged with the new emperor of Germany, Ferdinand the Second, who, in defiance of the oaths he had taken to maintain the freedom of the protestant worship, was putting in force a system of religious persecutions against the reformed, in order to become reconciled to the pope, and to have the censures and interdicts pronounced against him on account of the arrest of cardinal Clesius, accused of high treason, raised.

Paul the Fifth, in consequence of the repentance of the emperor, the zeal which he mani-

tested for orthodoxy, and the rich presents he sent to St. Peter, granted him absolution, confirmed his election, and authorised the Catholic bishops to consecrate him. We should also say, that the reason which appeared most conclusive to his holiness, and which determined him to become reconciled with Ferdinand the Second, and to absolve him from the enormous crime of having violated the privileges of the church in the person of a cardinal, was the distribution which the latter made of six hundred thousand crowns among the Borghese; for by the avowal of Father Bzovius, who has left us a pompous eulogium on the pope, it was a matter of joy to him to see those prosper whom he neglected no means of enriching.

Nicholas de Marbais, a doctor in theology, a cotemporary of Paul the Fifth, and a witness of all the turpitudes of the court of Rome, is more severe upon the pontiff than the Jesuit Bzovius, and condemns the nepotism of his holiness in terms so energetic, that we can not do better than translate the passage of this learned historian concerning the disorders of this reign—"Paul the Fifth," he says, "so robbed the faithful, that he was enabled to spend four millions of crowns in purchases of lands for his nephew the cardinal Borghese. He bought for him the lordship of Rignano, near Rome, from the family of Savelli, for three hundred and fifty thousand crowns; he gave a hundred thousand for the town of Sulmona, which belonged to the dominions of Naples: he paid six hundred thousand crowns for the domain of the four Casales: he has acquired property among the mountains of Rome for more than five hundred thousand crowns; he has expended eight hundred thousand crowns in the Borghese palace, solely for construction, buildings, and gardens; for his cabinet is so rich in works of art, that it is valued at eighteen hundred thousand crowns.

"And from what source does this immense wealth come? From the datary, that Pactolus which rolls waves of gold; for it is notorious that the patrimony of the Borghese could not support their prodigality, since every one knows that this family was reduced to great poverty before the exaltation of the pope. Times are now different; thanks to the robberies and rapines of his holiness, the Borghese are now the richest lords in Italy. If we open the registry of the bulls we shall be surprised to see in what a great number of pages no other name is found as the titulary of such and such a benefice: yet Paul the Fifth knew well to whom he gave them, and he is no other than that fop of a cardinal Borghese, whose name he conceals in order not to excite the indignation of those who are yet silly enough to believe in the equity of a pope.

"Paul the Fifth only gives his creatures charges and prebends of minor importance, which are vacant without personal charges. The benefices that have a certain value he confers on his nephew without circumlocution, or obscurity, or ambiguity of language. If they are small and puny, he flanks them with five or six others, so as to make one fat and large domain with which he gratifies these Borghese; finally, if by perchance, he confers a rich bishopric, he is careful to make it lean by loading it with a pension for his nephew, and thus transforms all the cardinals and prelates of his court into factors or curators for his dear Borghese.

"His holiness does not wish the princes of the church to be learned and expert, lest they may too easily perceive his ignorance; thus he does not grant the hat but to clowns without wit; to loggerheads of the vilest race, who have not spirit and courage to resent the cardinal nephew's boxing their ears; to asses who are content to graze on the lands of their benefices, and abandon the revenues of them to the Borghese. It would be really difficult for the cardinals Caphonus, Barberinus, Lantrec, and Spinola to tell in what cities they studied the belles lettres, for in regard to letters, they only know those letters of exchange which they have furnished to the nephew of the pope as a guarantee of the abandonment of their emoluments and the revenues of their property. As for other members of the sacred college, as Tonto, Lanfranc, Philonardo, and some of their colleagues, it would be still worse were we to ask them what profession they followed before they became cardinals. One was the organ player in the oratory, and received fifteen Julius a month as his pay; another was an obscene physician in a small street in Naples; the lord Philonardo was the keeper of a brothel; a fourth was the chief of a band of robbers, and was engaged every night in deserving the gallows; all, in fine, before having been covered with the Roman purple, were covered with filth, the scum of every thing that was vilest in Rome, the most abominable city in the world; and yet, infamous as they were, they were scarcely worthy to form the court of Paul the Fifth; for in that accursed court, the princes of the church freely abandoned themselves to all sorts of abominations with their Ganymedes. They did not fear in the face of day to ravish children, and carry off young girls for their voluptuous saloons. All knew that there was neither justice nor shame at the Vatican; they therefore took no pains to conceal their turpitudes. Prelates, as well as mere clergymen, went in open day, dressed in their camaïles, to the houses of women of pleasure, and caused the husbands or the fathers of the women or girls whom they had carried off to be assassinated publicly.

"Paul the Fifth laughs at all this dissoluteness, and wallows like a hog in the most stinking and disgusting odours of adultery, incest, and sodomy that can be imagined. And should he not applaud the murder of a husband or a father, who himself poisoned the wife of one of his brothers, because she refused his infamous caresses? Should he not glory in incests, who himself had bastards by his own sister, and who is the father of the cardinal nephew? Who, oh my God, will dare to recount the abominations which have procured for the wife of the second brother of his holiness the name of popess, which is publicly given to her at Rome; by what shameful means has she become the dispensress of bishoprics, cardinals' hats, and all the benefices; how is it that this new Joan governs the church, seated on the throne of the apostle, the tiara on her brow, and the keys of heaven in her hands, stained with licentiousness? Who shall dare to say that the pontiff, the supreme head of Christendom, the vicar of God on earth, has in the cardinal Borghese at once a nephew, a son, and a minion! Has God, in his immutable destiny, decided that the world shall be for ever governed by such monsters? Are the people for ever to bend their heads before tyrants? Is there never to come a day, in which the people, doing justice to popes and kings, shall sweep all despots from the earth? . . ."

At length, on the 28th of January, 1621, after having weighed down Italy for sixteen years, Paul the Fifth died from an attack of apoplexy

GREGORY THE FIFTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1621.]

Election of Gregory the Fifteenth—His history before being elevated to the pontifical chair—His efforts to establish the omnipotence of his see—Portrait of Ludovico Ludovisio, his nephew—Decree concerning the election of popes—Canonization of Ignatius Loyola—Massacre in the Grisons—Society of the propaganda—Persecutions and massacre of the reformed in Bohemia, Hungary, and Saxony—The pope congratulates Ferdinand on his religious zeal—Louis the Thirteenth follows the example of the emperor, and persecutes the protestants—Creation by the Jesuits of the fraternity of the Virgin—Catholic reaction in the United Provinces—Policy of Gregory towards England—The Jesuits in the Indies and America—Father Nobili at Peking—Elevation of the house of Austria—League against the empire and Spain—Affairs of the Valteline—Death of Gregory the Fifteenth.

THE funeral ceremonies of Paul the Fifth being over, the sacred college assembled, and fifty-two cardinals entered the conclave; Borghese and his faction presented the cardinal Campoza as their candidate for the papacy, one of those prelates who, during the preceding reign, were the most distinguished for their vices. The Ursini, and the ambassador of the court of France, who were opposed to the Borghese, presented Alexander Ludovisio as theirs, and intrigued so successfully for him, that he triumphed over his competitor. He was accordingly proclaimed chief of the church, and took the name of Gregory the Fifteenth.

The new pope was sprung from an illustrious family of Bologna, which had been incorporated into the Neapolitan nobility. Having entered the college of the Jesuits at Naples when very young, he had remained there until he was sixteen years old, and had only left it to study law in the university of Bologna; he then went to Rome to Gregory the Fourteenth, his countryman, who appointed him collateral of the senator. He was afterwards successively raised to the posts of refendary, civil judge of the cases of the vicarage, archbishop of Bologna, nuncio, and cardinal priest of the title of St. Mary beyond the bridge. Some ecclesiastical writers speak of the amenity and goodness of this pontiff; but historical facts contradict their allegations, and show that he did not yield to his predecessors in cruelty or perfidy.

Comprehending that the origin of the papal grandeur sprang from the intestine divisions which rent the Roman empire, Gregory resolved to embroil all Europe to re seize the ancient influence of the Holy See; and as he was already bent by age, and unable to surrender himself to the labours which were necessary for the realization of his plans, he determined to call to his aid the Society of the Jesuits, that indefatigable soldiery, which for almost a century had shown itself so ardent, so intrepid, so devoted to the interests of the court of Rome. He formed a council, all the members of which belonged to the order, and placed at their head his nephew Ludovico Ludovisio, a young man of twenty-five years of age, and a worthy pupil of the children of Loyola.

Although young, Ludovico had already the morals of the Roman clergy; he was prodigal, a debauchee, greedy of wealth and greatness; thus he threw himself with ardour into the new career opened to his ambition. The first acts of the new government showed the tendencies of Gregory the Fifteenth towards papal omnipotence. To prevent the influences of the ambassadors of foreign courts in the elections, his holiness made a decree, which enjoined on the cardinals in future conclaves, to give their suffrages by secret ballot, and not openly. The council was then occupied as to the means of rekindling the zeal of fanatics in every nation. For this purpose they proceeded to the canonization of several persons dead in the odour of sanctity, among others, Saint Theresa the Visionary, Louis de Gonzagua, Stanislaus Koteka, Philip de Ner, Isidore Agricola, Ambroise Sansedon, Jacques ne Saloniome, Francis Xavier, and Ignatius Loyola.

Money beginning to become scarce in the treasury of St. Peter, the pontiff published an extraordinary jubilee, for the double purpose of recruiting his finances, and of being enabled to judge of the state of religion in the different kingdoms of Europe; he could thus judge from the zeal which the princes showed in favouring his financial efforts, whether things were going on well for the Holy See. In Germany, Julius, bishop of Wirtzburg, the electoral prince Schweikard of Mayence, Maximilian of Bavaria, and the archduke Ferdinand, made no opposition to the sale of indulgences, and even laboured with ardour in the propagation of the papacy. Ferdinand the Second did more; he endeavoured to annihilate Lutheranism, and persecuted his subjects, to compel them to confess the Roman Catholic religion.

Even in France, the authority of the pope was scarcely any longer contested; the Jesuits commenced traversing Bearn, fire and sword in their hands, burning the protestant temples and murdering the Huguenots, who dared to resist them. In Switzerland, one of the chiefs of the Valtelines, named Jacques Robustelli, who was under the fatal influence of the Jesuits, assembled bands of wretches to exterminate the unfortunate Grisons who professed Calvinism. In the Tyrol, on the peaks of the Alps, as well as in the valleys, the reformed were tracked by the fanatical followers of the pope; towns, villages, the poorest hamlets become the prey of the flames; the public places, the high roads, the wildest defiles were tinged with the blood of protestants; in the Low Countries, Philip the Third displayed unusual vigour, and at the instigation of the pontifical court, he seized by force on the provinces which had formerly freed themselves from Spain, and prepared to bring them back beneath the double yoke of Madrid and Rome.

The Catholic reaction was making immense progress in every country in Christendom, and under such a pope as Gregory the Fifteenth, there was no fear that the court of Rome would permit an opportunity to escape of re-establishing its preponderance over the countries which had formerly been subject to it.—His holiness was first occupied with founding the society of the propaganda on the plans of a Capuchin, named Girolamo Narni, and was organising missions to all countries of the world; he then formed alliances with the Catholic sovereigns, and particularly with Ferdinand the Second, to whom he offered, through Charles Caraffa, his apostolic nuncio, a present of two hundred thousand crowns and his blessing, as a subsidy for the war, in exchange for his active and persevering assistance, in the extermination of the reformed in his kingdom.

The bargain being made, cohorts of Dominicans, Augustines, Franciscans, Carmelites, and Jesuits, hastened to range themselves beneath the banner of the cardinal Caraffa, and scattered themselves through Bohemia, to proceed regularly to the destruction of the Lutheran or Calvinist churches, in order to re-establish the customs of the Roman church, the communion in one kind, the celebration of mass in the Latin tongue, the sprinkling of holy water, the invocation of canonised fanatics, the auricular confession; finally, every thing which philosophers justly call the idolatry of the Catholic worship. The unfortunate who persisted in demanding the communion in both kinds, were thrown into dungeons or sent to the stake, and their property confiscated to the church. In the cities, they besieged the houses of protestants who refused to yield to the exhortations of the monks, "to constrain them to abandon their obstinacy," according to the expressions of the nuncio, that is to say, to put them to the most frightful tortures, until they had renounced their belief. In the country the soldiers and monks made general battles, burned the farm-houses, murdered the farmers, violated girls, polluted young children, sparing those only who called themselves Catholics. By these means, the cardinal Caraffa saw the number of abjurations daily increase, and he could soon announce to Gregory that Bohemia was entirely subject to the Holy See.

The same things occurred in Moravia; the cardinal Dietrich Stein, who was at once governor of the province and bishop of Olmutz, thus uniting the spiritual and temporal power, wished to rival the fanaticism and cruelty of Charles Caraffa; and notwithstanding the active opposition of the citizens, he drove from the province the sect of the Moravian brothers, who numbered more than fifteen thousand individuals, male and female, and who were much cherished for their mild and patriarchal manners.

In Austria, the hereditary state of the emperor Ferdinand, the religious reaction was also very successful; the prince had first published by the sound of the trumpet through the towns, villages, and smallest boroughs, that the inhabitants must become converted or leave the country; he then established an immense cordon of troops, who united the two frontiers at the mouth of the Danube, and who coming up the river, enveloped all the cities, and drove out of the territory the unfortunates who were unwilling to adopt the Catholic ritual. In Hungary, the emperor was compelled to employ craft, and even to grant privileges to the magnates, who were the lords of this country, to bring them back into the bosom of the church.

In Bavaria and Saxony, the Jesuit missionaries did wonders, and converted more than twenty thousand protestants; it is true, they were aided in it by the executioner. In the Palatinate the protestant worship was interdicted under the severest penalties, and the inhabitants were forced to submit to Catholicism. The Lower Palatinate was also subjected to the Roman church. Charles Caraffa, at the head of a legion of monks, fell upon that province, treated it as a conquered country, carried off from Heidelberg, its capital, the library, and a multitude of very precious manuscripts, which were transported to Rome.

In Upper Baden, the Margrave William carried on the same brigandage; the converting missionaries penetrated to Bamberg, Fulda, Eichsfeld, Paderborn, in the bishopric of Munster, to Halberstadt and Magdeburg.—They went as far as the city of Altona, and were preparing to enter Denmark and Norway.

Thus from the south to the north, from the east to the west of the Roman German empire, the restoration of the papacy was propagated with alarming celerity, and threatened to annihilate Lutheranism for ever.

Moreover, Gregory the Fifteenth, who understood admirably how to stimulate the fanatical zeal of sovereigns, conferred the electorate Palatine on Duke Maximilian, the sovereign of Bavaria, on account of the services he had rendered the church, and to excite a holy emulation among the other princes of Germany.—“Thy conduct, my son, has filled our heart with a torrent of delight, like to celestial manna. The daughter of Sion can at last shake from her head the ashes of grief, and clothe herself with the garments of joy! for soon will all the enemies of the throne of the apostle be reduced to dust.”

His holiness then extended his solicitude to France, and sought to make its king a worthy rival of Ferdinand the Second. Unfortunately, the splenetic Louis the Thirteenth was but too well disposed to follow the promptings of fanaticism, and a bitter war was carried on against the Huguenots, in all the provinces of the kingdom. Gentlemen of the reformed party even seconded the efforts of the monarch, and became converted to Catholicism, some to obtain posts and dignities, and others not to lose the privileges of their caste, which were beginning to be contested by the commons. Thus, the lords de la Force and de Chatillon, abjured Calvinism for the baton of a marshal; the old Leodiguières embraced Catholicism for the sword of constable; many others followed their example, and the protestant religion was, in fact, suppressed in a large number of boroughs and cities.

The Huguenots were prohibited from singing their psalms in the streets and in their houses; the rights and benefits guaranteed to them by the edict of Nantz, were contested; a royal commissary was placed in their churches to supervise the meetings; and, finally, the privileges they had won by their blood were taken from them one by one. Unable to unite or defend themselves, the Calvinists were compelled to be converted; the papacy was triumphant. Legions of missionaries, Jesuits, Franciscans, and Capuchins, traversed France every where, recruiting in their course thousands of neophytes, and organizing men and women into an immense society, called the fraternity of Mary. Bishops were in regular correspondence with the Holy See, and gave his holiness useful advice to hasten the extinction of the heresy. Thus the prelate of Vienne having perceived that the efforts of the missionaries were paralyzed by the eloquence of a preacher of St. Marcellin, wrote charitably to Rome for Gregory to solicit an order from Louis the Thirteenth to hang him. The bishop of St. Malo having been informed that the reformed assembled in their chateaux to sing psalms, demanded, through the apostolic nuncio, the cardinal Damiète, the demolition of these resorts of the Huguenots, which was immediately ordered. These active and increasing precautions which foreshadowed the approaching ruin of the Calvinists of France, gave so much contentment to the pope, that he wrote to Louis the Thirteenth: “My dear son, the ornament of the universe, the glory of our age, march on steadily in your holy path; cause the power of your arm to be felt by those who know not God; be pitiless towards the heretics, and merit to be seated one day on the right hand of Christ, by offering to him as a holocaust all the children of perdition who infect your kingdom.”

It was not in France only that the cause of the Reformation was abandoned by noble families; in the protestant states, in the cities which were most distinguished for their hatred to the papacy, the rich were converted to the Catholic religion from a hatred to the ideas of independence which the masses were gaining, and who were questioning the existence of signorial privileges and rights.

Cologne, Louvain, Namur, opened their gates to the Jesuits, and fifteen thousand inhabitants received confirmation at their hands; in the archbishopric of Utrecht, one hundred and fifty thousand conversions were counted; in the diocese of Harlem, one hundred thousand; at Lenwarden sixteen thousand; at Groeningen twenty thousand, and at Deventer sixty thousand.

Extraordinary, however, as had been the progress of the missionaries in the Low Countries, his holiness was not satisfied, and wrote to the king of Spain “to have no pity on the heretics; to order his governors to establish the Catholic religion by force in the provinces dependent on his crown, to light up the stake, and to leave the Calvinists no alternative but the mass or death.”

England, that impregnable bulwark of the Reformation, remained yet to be subjugated. The obstinate Gregory the Fifteenth was not discouraged by the checks his predecessors had encountered in their efforts at religious reaction, and he determined to re-establish Catholicism in Great Britain. He only profited by the faults of those who had gone before, and pursued an entirely opposite policy; instead of employing threats and rigour, he entered into friendly relations with James the First on this subject, and knowing that the king desired to obtain authority to marry his son, the romantic prince of Wales, to a Spanish princess, which Paul the Fifth had constantly refused, he sent him bulls of dispensation without imposing on him any condition, contenting himself with writing to the young prince, “that he hoped that the old seed of Christian piety which had formerly produced so many handsome flowers among the English kings, would germinate anew in his heart, and that he should regard his union with a Catholic wife as a happy presage for the Roman church in future."

The wary pontiff had foreseen that his Britannic majesty could not remain indebted to the Holy See, and would make some concessions to it, which in fact happened. By order of the king, the persecution of the Catholics ceased, and they were permitted the free exercise of their religion.

Rule over Europe was not, however, sufficient for the ambitious Gregory the Fifteenth; he must have it over the whole world; and finding no more enemies around him to combat, he turned his attention to remote countries, and thought of conquering for the Holy See the two Americas, the Indies, China, Japan, all Asia and Africa. Already had the Jesuits paved the way in South America, where they were all powerful, thanks to the massacre of more than twenty millions of Indians, and where they had elevated five archbishoprics, twenty-seven bishoprics, four hundred convents of different orders, a considerable number of parishes, a seminary, and two universities, one at Lima, the other at Mexico, for instruction in theology.

The East Indies had not been as well prepared to receive the yoke of Rome. During the pontificate of Paul the Third, the Jesuit Francis Xavier had converted, it is true, nearly three hundred thousand adepts in the vicinity of Goa—the inhabitants of the mountains of Cochinchina or of the environs of Cape Comorin. But the new Christians belonging to the lowest caste of the people of India, it had resulted that the Catholic religion, fallen into contempt, was called the religion of the Parias. The Jesuits, however, afterwards becoming more enlightened as to the views of the nations in the immense peninsula of Hindostan, changed their tactics. The father Nobili, sent as a missionary to those countries, determined to address himself to the highest classes, and on his arrival entered into communications with the Brahmins, clothed and lodged as they did, submitted to the same expiations, studied the Sanscrit, penetrated their sentiments and ideas. Profiting skilfully by one article of their belief, that there had been four ways to arrive at the truth, and that one of these was lost, he declared that he had found that fourth way which led at once to immortality, and initiated them into a knowledge of Christianity. He was guarded, however, in injuring their prejudices; he adopted some of the rites of the country, used even the same expressions which were used in the religion of the Brahmins, and took every precaution not to be suspected of teaching the same belief which Francis Xavier had done.

Some Portuguese prelates from the Indian archipelago, who were in intercourse with the people of the continent, were scandalised at this mode of making converts; they addressed vehement complaints to the court of Rome, and demanded that his holiness should disapprove of the abominable practices which Father Nobili had introduced into Christianity. But the sovereign pontiff received their complaints badly, and replied to them not to interfere in these matters; that the holy missionary was labouring with zeal and intelligence for the greatest glory of God, and that he had an absolute dispensation to do as he pleased, to commit sacrilege, adultery, and even shed the blood of men, if he thought it useful for the success of his glorious enterprise.

In China, the Society of Jesus had also sown the seeds of Catholicism. Father Ricci, one of the dignitaries of the order, had been enabled, towards the close of the sixteenth century, to introduce himself into the celestial empire, by means of a trick, and by passing off for a follower of Confucius. He had afterwards reached Peking, and been admitted to the emperor, by offering him a clock that struck, then a very rare thing. Ricci had finally conducted himself so skilfully, that he had gained the confidence of the monarch, and that of several mandarins, so that before his death, he had obtained authority to introduce missionaries to preach Christianity.

The Jesuits, who replaced the good father, were at first surprised at the singular method of propagating his doctrines which he had adopted, and which consisted in nothing less than passing the day at table with the mandarins and surrendering himself to every excess of intemperance. They wrote to Rome to the pope for advice. Gregory the Fifteenth replied to them, that he absolved them in advance from all the sins which they might commit in view of the interests of religion; that they need not be disturbed about them, since crimes even became pious works, when committed for the purpose of assuring the triumph of the Holy See.

In Japan, the progress of the papacy was still more surprising; thirty colleges of Jesuits and three hundred churches, were already counted in that empire. In Africa, as well as in Asia, the Holy See was conquering new subjects, and the intrepid Jesuit Paëz, at the head of a handful of soldiers, penetrated as far as Abyssinia, forced the sovereign of that country, Settan Segued, to become a convert to Christianity, snatched all Ethiopia from the Socinian monks who were dependents on the metropolitan of Alexandria, and forced the authority of the commissioner of Gregory the Fifteenth, Father Alphonso Mendez, appointed patriarch of Ethiopia by his holiness, to be recognised. Finally, even in the provinces conquered by the Musselmén, even in Constantinople itself, the Jesuits had established colleges, and were labouring to destroy the religion of Mahomet for the benefit of the papacy.

Thus, Gregory the Fifteenth, that weak, sickly old man, constantly tormented by cruel maladies, had found, by the immense activity of his mind, means to extend his sway over the whole world, and what was the most extraordinary in this Catholic propaganda, of which he was every where the soul in Europe, was that it followed in its developments, the invading march of the great powers, and seconded the armies to enchain, in superstition, the people conquered by the sword.

Important changes in the respective relations of nations, resulted from this agreement between the papacy and monarchies. The most important certainly was, the elevation of the house of Austria, which had heretofore exercised a very secondary influence over the affairs of Europe. The Italian republics, whose independence was threatened by the growth of this power, were at last aroused by the invasion of the Valteline by Austrian troops, who had fallen on this country to exterminate its inhabitants, and asked the interference of the French arms. Louis the Thirteenth, who was fearful of losing his influence over Italy, if Ferdinand the Second remained master of the Valteline, formed a league with Savoy and Venice, to constrain the house of Austria, to give up the defiles and places on which it had seized. Gregory the Fifteenth, being interested in keeping those sovereigns on good terms, interfered in the quarrel, and was among the first to claim, after the extermination of the protestants of the Valteline, that Austria and Spain should abandon the cities they had conquered. His holiness even declared that he was ready to take charge of them himself, and to occupy them with his troops, until the susceptibilities of Italy and France were entirely reassured as to the good intentions of Ferdinand the Second and Philip the Fourth. This arrangement was agreed to, and Gregory, by the consent of the belligerents, placed garrisons in the towns and on the frontiers which were the object of disputes.

The pontiff was already thinking of taking advantage of this circumstance for his family, and of giving the Valteline in fief to one of his nephews, when death came to arrest the execution of his plans, and to deprive the church of one of the most skilful politicians who ever occupied the chair of St. Peter. This event took place on the 8th of July, 1623.

Several excellent historians, and especially Heydegger, have contested the great political reputation of Gregory the Fifteenth, and maintain that his holiness had only mind enough to comprehend his own incapacity for business, and to surrender the government of the church to the mistress of his nephew, Ludovico Ludovisio, a woman endowed with a prodigious genius.

This assertion is confirmed by the testimony of Cardinal Richelieu, who thus expresses himself in his memoirs. "Gregory the Fifteenth was a better man than a good pope, his only quality being an excessive love for his relatives, who, seeing him worn down by his great age, not only seized on every occasion to use with avidity this facility for enriching themselves, but constantly abused the weakness of his holiness. By the advice of Ludovisio, his nephew, or rather of the mistress who governed that cardinal, he accomplished very strange actions, and we must regard them as proceeding from an authority rather claimed by the popes than admitted by the church, rather founded on the abuses of the Roman court, than the merit of the chair of St. Peter. Once only could he resist the will that governed him, it was on the approach of death; as his nephew was pressing him to make still more cardinals, he replied to him, "that he could not do so, since there did not remain more than enough time to ask pardon from God for having created so many, and so unworthy." These words of Richelieu are entitled to more weight, since that minister owed his promotion to the cardinalate to him.

URBAN THE EIGHTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1623.] 1624 P. 318-

Troubles in Rome excited by the cardinal Barberino—He aspires to the papacy—He poisons his competitors in the conclave—Exaltation of the cardinal Maffeo Barberino by the name of Urban the Eighth—His history before being pope—His character—His strange rules—He wishes to follow the policy of his predecessor—Strife between him and Richelieu, the minister of Louis the Thirteenth—Plan of marriage between the prince of Wales and Henrietta Maria of France—General war between the different powers of Europe—The pope joins the protestants to combat Richelieu—The Jesuits attack the minister, by order of the holy father—Civil war in France—Troubles in England—Assassination of Buckingham—Siege of Rochelle—Louis the Thirteenth sacks the cities of the south—Forcible continuation of the Catholic propaganda in the states of Germany—Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, declares himself the champion of protestantism—Quarrels between Ferdinand the Second and Urban the Eighth—The pope calls Gustavus Adolphus to the aid of the Holy See—Victory of the king of Sweden over the confederated armies of the house of Austria—Urban turns against Gustavus Adolphus—Death of that prince—The protestant party more formidable than ever in Germany—Urban the Eighth causes the young duke of Urbino to be assassinated—Condemnation of Galileo Galilei—Persecution of sorcerers—Curious details about the Sabbaths of magicians and Bohemians—The princess of Lorraine possessed of a devil—History of the devil of Loudun—Punishment of Urban Grandier—Louis the Thirteenth places his kingdom under the protection of the Virgin—Richelieu wishes to be appointed patriarch in France—Doctrines and morality of the Jesuits—Commencement of Jansenism—St. Cyran and Port Royal—Quarrels between the pope and Cardinal Richelieu—Publication of the Augustinus—The Jansenists and Molinists—Wars in Italy excited by the ambition and avidity of the nephews of the pontiff—Death of Urban the Eighth.

THE funeral rites of Gregory were not over when the factions commenced in Rome to give the tiara to their chiefs. The cardinal Maffeo Barberino exhibited the most ardour in the struggle, though he was rejected by the Spaniards, the French, the parties of the Borghese, and of Ludovisi, by the old cardinals, in fine, by almost all the sacred college. Far from being discouraged by the repulsion, of which he was the object, Barberino became only the bolder, and understanding that he could not count on the cardinals to scale the throne of St. Peter, he determined not to be chosen, but to impose himself.

By his orders, his brothers and nephews subsidised a troop of banditti, ran through the city, excited the people in the suburbs, and produced a revolt which compelled the cardinals to take refuge in the Vatican, and to form a conclave at once.

Barberino came to take his place among his colleagues, as if nothing extraordinary had happened; he listened at first with much patience to the discourses of the different candidates for the papacy; he then spoke, pointed out to the sacred college the necessity of choosing, to occupy the chair of St. Peter, a man endowed with great energy, and who was capable of arresting the disorders of the Roman populace; he did not even conceal that he exercised a certain influence over the excitors of the troubles, and announced, impudently, that tranquillity would be restored to the holy city as soon as the cardinals had placed on his head the venerated tiara of the pontiffs. This declaration, instead of giving him votes, only rendered the repulsion he had inspired still more unanimous, and he received not a single vote. He was not disturbed by this general reprobation; he did not abandon the part he had taken, he only judged that things were not sufficiently advanced, and sent secret instructions out of doors, that the banditti should carry fire and sword every where. His orders were punctually executed; Rome became the theatre of frightful atrocities; the bravos of the cardinal pillaged houses, murdered old men and children, violated women and young girls, and exercised the most frightful profanations on their dead bodies. When they were satiated with carnage and licentiousness, they ran through the streets of the city with torches in their hands, and stopped beneath the ramparts of San Angelo, where they uttered this terrible threat, "Death and fire, or Pope Barberino." These clamours reached even to the ears of the cardinals, assembled in the hall of the conclave, and chilled them with terror, the ballot, however, continued, and the name of Barberino did not leave the room. It was then remarked, with alarm, that the sacred college daily lost some of its members, either by death or sickness, and that these cardinals who disappeared so strangely, were those who exhibited the most opposition to the terrible Barberino. It became evident to all that he was ridding himself of his enemies by poison; for those who died were carried off in a few hours, whilst those who were sick could not mitigate their sufferings by the use of well known antidotes. All opposition at once ceased in the conclave, and the cardinal Maffeo Barberino was proclaimed sovereign pontiff by the name of Urban the Eighth.

The new pope was sprung from an old and noble family of Florence; he had first been clerk of the apostolic chamber, then nuncio of the Holy See to the court of France. At the time of his exaltation he was only fifty-five years old, and appeared endowed with strong health, and an energetic constitution.

As soon as he was seated on the throne of St. Peter, he elevated his nephew and brothers to the first dignities in church and state, in recompense for the assistance they had lent him, although they were notoriously unfit to fill such functions, and though he knew their incapacity perfectly, since he said himself, that his nephew, Francis Barberino, whom he had introduced into the sacred college, was only fit to say paternosters; that his brother Anthony, created cardinal of the title of St. Onophre, had no other merit than that of infecting the consistory, and driving away the members by the frightful smell of his frock; that his second nephew, the cardinal Anthony the younger, surnamed, in derision, Demosthenes, on account of a natural defect which made him stutter when he spoke, was only fit to get drunk three times a day; that the last of his nephews, Don Thadeo, whom he had appointed prefect of Rome, prince of Palestrina, and generalissimo of the armies of the Holy See, was better fitted to carry a distaff than a sword. As, however, his holiness had only to draw the purse of the faithful to enrich the members of his family, he did not hesitate to gorge them with gold, or to give them lands or domains, to provide them with benefices, to purchase palaces, and even principalities, for them.

Urban was then occupied about church matters; he prohibited the Franciscan friars from wearing the sandals and pointed hood, like the Capuchins; he prohibited the old Carmelites from calling themselves reformed Carmelites, a designation which belonged to the new order of Capuchins instituted by St. Francis; he exacted that the Premonstrant monks of Spain should resume their old habit and the name of brother, which they had abandoned from pride; he made different rules to modify certain ceremonies in the worship, which caused religion to fall into disrepute; he prohibited the exposure in the churches, for public veneration, of the statues of the faithful, dead in the odour of sanctity; of lighting tapers on their tombs, and particularly of publishing their miracles, without the approval of the court of Rome; which did not prevent him in the same month, and by a singular contradiction, from beatifying two Theatine fanatics, Andrew Avellina and Gaëtan of Thienna; a Carmelite debauchee, Felix Cantalice; a wretched inquisitor, Francis Borgia, duke of Candia, and general of the Jesuits, one of the descendents of the ancient family of the Borgias; a fanatic, the Florentine Carmelite, Coisuri; two extatic women, Mary Madeline de Pazzi, and Elizabeth, queen of Portugal, and, finally, the blessed St. Roch and his dog.

When his holiness had regulated with the most minute attention all that concerned monks, and the worship of saints, he prepared to pursue the work of religious propagation which his predecessor had so happily commenced; following his example, he resolved to rely on brute force and preaching, that is, to employ by turns soldiers and Jesuits, the one to conquer, the other to subjugate and corrupt.

Of a daring and fierce character, Urban thought of first putting himself beyond the reach of every enemy from within or without; he constructed on that side of the Bolognese territory, which afforded an easy access to Rome, a fortress which he called Fort Urban; he surrounded the castle of San Angelo with a new rampart, which was already defended by double walls, and he provided it so abundantly with munitions of war, that it could sustain a siege of many years; he also raised a wall around his gardens of Monte Cavallo; he then established a manufacture of arms at Tivoli, disposed of the grounds of the library of the Vatican for the construction of an arsenal, and, finally, he transformed into a city of war the apostolic city, which should be the peaceful sanctuary of the morality of Christ.

His holiness regarded it an honour to leave gigantic monuments of his passage over the throne of the apostle, and to cause posterity to say, that if the popes, his predecessors, had raised palaces of granite and marble, he had produced from the soil monuments of bronze and iron.

He rarely took the trouble to assemble the consistory, and when he called together the sacred college, as he was unwilling to listen to counsel or remark, the cardinals had nothing to do but applaud his words and execute his decisions. So with the ambassadors of kings, he argued from his privilege of infallibility, when treating of the most serious matters. No pontiff before him, neither Gregory the Seventh nor Boniface the Eighth, had possessed the sentiment of individual importance in so high a degree; thus in a very grave question, the commissioners of a foreign power having presented an objection to him drawn from the old pontifical constitutions, he replied, imperiously, that his decision had more weight than the regulations of two hundred dead popes.

The athletic power with which he was endowed, contributed not a little to increase the high importance he entertained of himself. He wished to be adored as the spiritual head of the church and the king of the earth; and in his pride he dared to revoke a law, which prohibited the Roman people from ever raising a statue to a living pope, on the ground that it could never have been foreseen that the chair of St. Peter would be occupied by such a pontiff as himself.

Beyond doubt, a priest of this character, obstinate, absolute, recoiling before nothing to reach his end, would have done more than any of his predecessors for the misfortune of man, and would have bowed all Europe beneath the yoke of the Roman theocracy, if he had not met on the way another priest not less obstinate, not less absolute, not less implacable than himself, and excelling him in skill and address; Richelieu, the minister or rather the sovereign of France, under the imbecile Louis the Thirteenth, and having, consequently, to maintain interests diametrically opposed to those of the court of Rome.

Whilst Urban was labouring to augment the preponderance of the house of Austria over Europe, to annihilate the Reformation, and induce the triumph of Catholicism, Richelieu was seeking to oppose an obstacle to the encroachments of Ferdinand the Second, was contracting offensive and defensive alliances with the protestants of Germany, and skillfully negotiating with James the First and his minister Buckingham, to stop the marriage of the prince of Wales, with the Infanta, now his mistress, and who was waiting but the dispensation from Rome to celebrate his nuptials. Urban committed the fault of not expediting the bulls of dispensation of the young princess, though his predecessor had already sent those of the prince, to compel the son of the king of England to be converted. This delay permitted Richelieu to intrigue at the court of London, and one day his holiness learned with extreme surprise that King James was about to recall his son home, and had sent to France a solemn embassy to demand the hand of the princess Henrietta Maria, third sister of Louis the Thirteenth, for the prince of Wales.

He at once addressed representations to the court of France to prevent this union; he offered as a compensation to marry the princess Henrietta Maria to the infant Don Carlos, and to give them the sovereignty of the Catholic Low Countries as a dowry; he even addressed two briefs on the subject to the cardinal, and finding that nothing could change the determination of the minister, he declared he would go further and refuse the dispensations necessary for the marriage. Richelieu replied laconically, "Go on." His holiness then turned his attention to England, and sought by promises to turn aside King James from his plans; but as the alliance of his son with the sister of Louis the Thirteenth procured serious advantages for the king of Great Britain, the prospect of spreading religious troubles in his kingdom, and the hope of recovering the Palatinate for his son-in-law Duke Frederic, who had been ejected from it by Gregory the Fifteenth, induced him to reject the proposals of the court of Rome, and to cause the marriage of the young prince with Henrietta Maria to be published. Such a determination was equivalent to a declaration of war.

Richelieu had for a long time foreseen the case of a rupture, and had allied himself with powerful auxiliaries, so as to strike a great blow at Austria and Spain, by attacking them simultaneously on all their frontiers. It was the first example of several states lending each other mutual assistance to crush a formidable foe; the parts were thus distributed; Venice, Savoy, and France were to expel the papal troops from the Valteline, and assume the offensive in Italy; Holland was with her marine to attack South America; England was to disembark an army on the shores of Spain, the Turks were to invade Hungary, and the king of Denmark at the head of all the forces of his kingdom, and those of Lower Germany, was to fall on the Palatinate, and join Prince Mansfeld to attack the emperor of Austria in his hereditary states. Such was the organization of this formidable league.

France having undertaken to give the signal for action, the marquis de Cœuvres entered the Valteline at the head of a body of troops, and in less than eight days conquered the country, and forced the soldiers of the pope to retreat in disgrace into the states of the church. This invasion the more discontented Urban the Eighth, as he already regarded the Valteline as his property, and was preparing to form it into a principality for Don Thadeo, his nephew, the general of the pontifical troops. He was, however, careful not to allow the cause of his strong resentment to appear; he feigned to see in the invasion by the French, a proof that the cardinal Richelieu had abandoned the cause of orthodoxy for Calvinism, and instead of declaring war on France, he only prepared to raise up powerful enemies to the minister of Louis the Thirteenth.

A certain knight, named Bernardin, was sent from Rome to the leaders of the protestant party; who furnished them with money, made them magnificent promises, and induced them to raise the standard of civil war; on the other side the nuncio Spada despatched a legion of Jesuits into the Catholic provinces, to exalt the fanatical devotees against the cardinal, which succeeded admirably. Richelieu then found himself exposed to the hatred of both parties, and at once attacked by the Huguenots and Catholics.

For any other man the position would not have been tenable; but the ambitious cardinal was not the man to surrender his power without striving to the last; besides, if threatened within, had he not allies without who were capable of succouring him? He brought then from Germany the troops which the protestant states had placed at his disposal for the great coalition, and instead of employing them against the Holy See or the house of Austria, he used them to crush the religionists of France; then betraying his allies, he treated with the pope, and engaged to make the projects of the league abortive, if the court of Rome consented to expedite the bulls of dispensation necessary for the marriage of Henrietta Maria with the prince of Wales. Soon after the ratification of these arrangements, James the First died and left the crown of England to his son Charles the First.

In conformity with the secret intentions

agreed upon by the sovereigns of France and England, or rather between their ministers and the Holy See, the armaments directed against the house of Austria were suspended, the money destined for the king of Denmark and Prince Mansfield was stopped, so that the latter, finding themselves in the enemies' provinces, without provisions and subsidies, were obliged to retreat, after having been defeated at the battle of Lutter. This event had been foreseen by Duke Olivarez, the first minister of the king of Spain, and by the cardinal de Richelieu, for they learned in France, at almost the same time, the defeat of the king of Sweden, the dissolution of the league against the house of Austria, the publication of the treaty of Mouzon, between Louis the Thirteenth, Ferdinand the Second, and Philip the Fourth of Spain, and the consummation of the projected marriage between the princess Henrietta Maria and the new king of England, without the ministers of the three powers having deigned to consult the court of Rome. Richelieu triumphed, not only on the subject of the Valteline, whose independence he caused to be recognised in the treaty of Mouzon, but also in humbling the pride of the Holy See, and in permitting it to interfere in conferences only as a power of the second class.

Urban the Eighth then discovered what kind of an adversary he had to combat; and, in his rage at being unable to annihilate, with ecclesiastical thunders, or temporal arms, a cardinal who threatened to substitute the supreme authority of kings for the omnipotence of the pope, he unchained against him, a Jesuit named Santarelli, an enthusiastic madman of the theocracy, one of the fiercest satellites of the papacy, who lanced into the Catholic world a furious pamphlet, which left far behind it all the treatises of Mariana, Bellarmine, Suarez, and Becan. The work having been denounced to the parliament, and brought before the Sorbonne, underwent a double condemnation before these two tribunals, and was publicly burned by the hands of the executioner. A sentence of parliament, moreover, enjoined on the Jesuits who were resident in France, to subscribe to the censure of the Sorbonne against Santarelli, or leave the kingdom.

The last part of this decree was not executed; the cardinal, who feared to push these fanatics to extremes, lest he should perish by poison or the poniard, interfered, and contented himself with exacting a simple declaration, in which the Jesuits recognised the independence of the monarch in all that concerned the temporal affairs of the kingdom.

But the book of Santarelli was differently received at the court of the devotee Ferdinand the Second; instead of exciting the just resentment of the prince, it inspired him with remorse for his rebellion; he asked pardon from the holy father in all humility, for having sought to free himself from the yoke of Rome; and to obtain his pardon, he made, at the instigation of his confessor, an edict, providing that, after the expiration of six months from the day of St. Ignatius, he would no longer tolerate in his hereditary kingdom of Bohemia, any of his subjects, be he even a prince, unless he professed the Catholic religion. He published like edicts for Upper Austria, and the provinces of Carniola, Carinthia, and Styria. In vain did the unfortunate inhabitants of those countries solicit a longer delay to obey the orders of the sovereign; the nuncio Caraffa and the Jesuits represented to his majesty that these requests were only made in the hope of a change of government, and that the citizens should either become converts, or emigrate, or prepare to perish.

In Germany, things took the same course; the imperial armies had advanced as far as the Straits of Cattegut, to the shores of the Baltic, occupied Brandenburg, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and threatened to crush the protestant capitals if they showed the slightest resistance. Urban triumphed in his turn, and by virtue of his universal omnipotence, he regulated the destinies of the countries which the house of Austria had subjugated; he gave the city of Magdeburg, in full sovereignty, to an archbishop; he created a new Catholic arch-ducal government under the direction of the nuncio Caraffa, in order to extirpate heresy from Upper Germany; he invested the count of Nassau Liegen, the young counts of Neubourg, as well as the grand master of the Teutonic order, all bitter Catholics, with the countships and cities of the Upper Palatinate, on the condition that they should convert the people and nobles of the country, willingly, or by force. He parcelled out the dutchies and countships of Lower Germany, gave them as the hound's fee to the priests and Jesuits most devoted to the Holy See. He confirmed the usurpations of the bishops of Constance and Augsburg, and those of the abbots Moenchsreitt and Kaisersheim, who, by the aid of those disorders, had seized on the domains of the ducal house. He also approved of the robberies made to the prejudice of Nuremberg, Strasburg, Hal, Ulm, and Lindau, by Catholic prelates and chapters.

Great as were these advantages for the papacy, they did not yet satisfy Urban the Eighth, for the nature of priests is such that success only increases their ambition, as the possession of great wealth only augments an insatiable thirst for gold. His holiness was jealous of the prosperity of the protestants of the north of Germany, and wished to subjugate Holland. The imbecile Ferdinand then prepared, in obedience to the pope, to invade the north of Germany, notwithstanding the difficulties which such an enterprise presented, and whilst Rome was preparing its batteries against the Hollanders. For Urban, in attacking these people, had a double end, of reducing their country beneath his sway, and of preparing the means of carrying the war into England.

But he wished, first, to follow the example of Richelieu, and form a league against these two allied powers. He first intrigued with the French ambassador; he maintained that Charles the First had not fulfilled the solemn promises made at the time of his marriage with Henrietta Maria; he accused that prince of ill treatment of his wife, and engaged the ambassador to urge Louis the Thirteenth to a terrible war against Charles the First, to take from him his three crowns, of England, Scotland, and Ireland. His holiness then made overtures to the Spanish ambassador on the same subject; he instructed him to inform Philip the Fourth, that it was his duty to come to the aid of the queen of England, his sister-in-law, under penalty of eternal damnation, and to employ his efforts to wrest her from the hands of a heretic and a traitor, who placed religion in danger. Conferences then being entered upon, Urban did his best to prevent the duke of Olivarez, the minister of the king of Spain, and the cardinal Richelieu from penetrating the secret of his policy, and confided the charge of the negotiations to his nuncio Spada, reserving only to himself the organization of the plan of the campaign, to point out the means of capturing the English ships on the coast of France, and of burning their fleets in their ports.

The holy father and his counsel discovered a ruse of war so ingenious, and which appeared so infallibly to assure the success of the confederates, that the ministers of France and Spain, undecided, until this time, on the part they ought to take, no longer hesitated, and concluded a treaty with the Holy See. They even divided their projected conquest in advance, and the nuncio Spada was charged, under the seal of secrecy, to inform Urban the Eighth, that Ireland had fallen to him and that he could govern it by his nephew, Thadeo Barberino, in the capacity of viceroy of the Holy See, and that, in compensation, he should use all his influence over the emperor to bring Germany, as well as Italy, into the confederation, so as to be enabled to strive on the sea against the maritime preponderance of the English and Hollanders.

Careful as they were not to allow the secret of these negotiations to transpire, a rumour of them reached the court of Charles the First, and determined that prince to commence hostilities by striking a great blow. By his orders Buckingham, his favourite minister, appeared with a formidable fleet on the coast of France, disembarked on the Isle of Rhé, seized on it, and spread abroad proclamations, calling the Huguenots to arms, in the name of liberty and of political and religious independence.

Roban and Soubise, who were the leaders of the reformed in France, hastened to assemble troops to retake the offensive in the civil war, and we might soon believe that the moment for the triumph of Calvinism had come. Unfortunately, Richelieu was there, and the papacy was saved. The cardinal minister assembled a fleet and an army, directed them at once against the English vessels and the reformed, and that so successfully, that Buckingham was forced to retreat and set sail for England, leaving to the Huguenots all the burthen of the war. The latter, unable to maintain the strife in the open country, retired to their fortified cities, and chiefly to Rochelle, which was, if we may so speak, the Rome of their religion. But the terrible cardinal did not allow them to escape so easily; he pursued them under the very walls of the place, well determined to take the city, so as to make an end of the Reformation. The siege then commenced, and was vigorously urged by the cardinal in person. It was indeed no ordinary effort to besiege a city which was fortified towards the sea by six great bastions, containing one hundred pieces of artillery, which marshes and triple walls rendered almost inaccessible by land, and the position of whose port, moreover, rendered them able to receive provisions and succour from without.

Independently of all these difficulties, Richelieu knew that he had to deal with determined men, who had sworn to bury themselves under the ruins of their city, rather than surrender. Thus, on the first news which he received of the preparations of Buckingham, who was making arrangements to come with a numerous fleet to break the blockade of Rochelle, the cardinal thought of retreating; but a letter which he received from a Jesuit in London made him change his determination. One of the fathers of the Society of Jesus informed the minister that he had nothing more to fear from Buckingham; the event justified the prediction; the favourite of James the First was assassinated.

His eminence then determined to take the place by famine; he encircled it with a fosse three leagues in extent, defended by thirteen great redoubts, to batter down all sorties, and intercept the convoys which arrived by land. He then built in the roadstead a dike of two hundred and ninety-four yards long, to cut off all communications between the city and the sea, leaving but a single opening, through which two vessels could scarcely pass abreast, and erecting on each shore of the stream two strong forts to defend this narrow passage. The protestants were thus blocked up without hopes of succour, and having no alternative but that of submission, or of dying by famine. They, however, continued to defend themselves bravely, and when the envoys of the cardinal minister came to propose to the leaders of the reformed to surrender the city at discretion, Guiton, its governor, rose from his seat, placed his dagger on the council table, and declared that he would kill with his own hand the first Huguenot who spoke of capitulating.

For a whole year this heroic constancy did not fail for a moment; the inhabitants ate horses, dogs, rats, cats, and mice, and finally, the atrocities which had desolated Paris during the horrible siege of that capital were renewed in this unfortunate city.

As every thing in this world must have an end, the cardinal minister, informed of the extremities to which the besieged were reduced, and that twelve thousand had died from inanition, determined on a general assault, that the execrable Louis the Thirteenth, who had joined him, might enjoy the sight of a city abandoned to pillage. But the longing of the monarch was disappointed, and he could not contemplate the massacre of his subjects by an unbridled soldiery, nor the violence exercised upon women and young girls, nor incendiarism carrying its devouring flame over all the edifices, amid the cries of the conquerors, the groans of the wounded, and the sighing of their victims.

The fall of Rochelle was a terrible blow for Calvinism. Some bands of the reformed, however, still appeared in arms in the southern provinces; the small town of Privas, in Vivarais, dared even to maintain a siege against the royal army, commanded by Louis in person. It was carried by assault, and by the command of his majesty, the Catholic soldiers committed there atrocities which equalled those which had been exercised at Merindol on the unfortunate Vaudois. The city of Alaix also endeavoured to defend itself, but was constrained to capitulate. The duke of Rohan then convened a general assembly of the reformed party at Anduze, where it was determined that an embassy should be sent to the king to treat for peace.

Louis the Thirteenth granted an edict of pacification to the Calvinists, with the abolition of their former privileges; that is to say, that he permitted the Huguenots to profess the reformed religion, but without the power to hold political assemblies, and without having the right to appoint chiefs and form a common treasury. This triumph of Catholicism in France was not very satisfactory to Urban the Eighth, who, in exciting a war against the protestants, had no other intention than to prepare the ruin of Great Britain. Thus the nuncio Spada, and the Jesuits, who were the confessors of the kings and ministers of France and Spain, received orders from his holiness to stimulate the duke Olivarez and the cardinal minister, to concert their plan of attack against England.

This war of invasion was still more favourable to the court of Rome, as it was in some way to produce the subjugation of Great Britain to the papacy. Whether Charles the First determined to submit to avoid hostilities, or whether he resolved to enter on a war whose result was not doubtful, his Britannic majesty being exposed to the hatred of the Catholics and protestants of his kingdom, on account of his despotism.

Charles well understood the difficulties of his position, and not daring to expose himself to the chances of a war with France and Spain, he determined first to temporise; and, to bring the pope into his interests, he appeared to incline in favour of the ultra montane doctrines, without, however, adhering to them in a formal manner; he then entered into a secret engagement to labour for the conversion of his people, provided his holiness would dissolve the league.

Urban, satisfied with attaining the end proposed, the submission of the king of England, was unwilling to hurry matters, and was contented with the formal assurances which Charles the First gave him of his conversion. It was, moreover, in accordance with the views of the pontiff to put an end to the war, so as not to furnish the kings of France and Spain, as well as the emperor of Germany, the occasion of increasing their influence over Europe, and of annihilating, to a certain extent, the authority of the Holy See. In fact, the success of the arms of Ferdinand the Second, gave serious disquietude to the court of Rome concerning the future. Urban the Eighth saw with displeasure the preponderance of the house of Austria increasing, and dreaded lest the emperor, master of the north, should fall back on the south, and take a fancy to revive the pretensions of sovereignty over the states of the church.

These fears were the better founded, since, after the fall of Christiern the Fourth, who, driven from city to city by the imperialist generals Wallenstein and Tilly, had thrown himself into his last fortified place, the city of Gluckstadt, nothing could prevent Ferdinand from adding the kingdom of Denmark to his empire, and thus becoming the most powerful monarch in Europe. His holiness, therefore, caused the Jesuit who was the confessor of the prince, to interfere in the matter, and to induce him to grant to Christiern the Fourth a much more advantageous peace than he could have hoped for, for it preserved to him the integrity of his kingdom. The reason of this singular solicitude of the court of Rome for the protestants, arose from the fact that it would have more to fear from them, if reduced to extremities, and because it also thought seriously of diminishing the preponderance of the empire of Germany.

Urban the Eighth had also the same motives for his distrust of Spain, which was beginning to weigh down the states of Italy, and threatened one day, with the assistance of the emperor, to bring them beneath its rule; but not daring to break with Philip the Fourth, he continued to remain his ally, ready to turn against him on the first opportunity. He had not long to wait; an unforeseen event set all the great political interests to work. Don Vincenzo, duke of Mantua, was on his deathbed, and left no direct heir. The duke of Nevers, his nearest relative, who was a Frenchman, having surrendered his rights in favour of his son Charles, duke of Réthel, the latter naturally considered himself as the heir of Mantua and Montferrat. As it was presumable that Spain would not permit a French prince to establish himself in Upper Italy, if it had time to oppose his installation, Urban caused Strizzio, the minister of Vincenzo, to write to the duke of Réthel to come secretly to Mantua, to have his rights recognised by the old duke, which was done without any difficulty on the part of the dying man.

There was still a princess of the ducal family, a great-granddaughter of Philip the Second, who was a nun. His holiness, foresaw that Spain would raise pretensions in favour of this young girl, and to remove the least pretext for war from Philip the Fourth, had sent her a dispensation of marriage, so that on the same evening, this young girl was brought out of her convent, and married to Duke Francis. A few hours afterwards the old Vincenzo died, and Charles de Réthel was hailed prince of Mantua.

This news caused a great sensation at Madrid. Duke Olivarez, furious at seeing himself outwitted by a young man, gave vent to his anger, and announced that he would make the new prince repent his rashness. To realise his threats, he excited two powerful enemies against him, the dukes of Guastalea and Savoy, who raised pretensions, the one to the dutchy of Mantua, the other to Montferrat, which was regarded as the key of the Milanese. He then sent orders to Don Gonzalez de Cordova, the governor of Milan, for Philip the Fourth to take up arms at once, and join his troops to those of the dukes of Guastalea and Savoy.

Urban the Eighth, the planner of the whole matter, immediately despatched couriers to the court of Louis the Thirteenth, to inform him of what was passing, and to engage him to come to the succour of the duke of Mantua. His holiness further offered to the king of France to place him at a head of a league against Spain, to take from it the Milanese, Sicily, and the kingdom of Naples. This proposal flattered too agreeably the ambition of Louis, for him not to accept it. He immediately assembled an army, and though it was mid winter, sent to attack the defiles of the Alps, which were guarded by the troops of the duke of Savoy. In less than three weeks the defiles were carried, the city of Suza taken by assault, and Victor Amadeus compelled to sue for peace. The king of France then prepared a treaty, which laid the bases of a perpetual league between him, the pope, the republic of Venice, and the dutchy of Mantua.

These two last powers hastened to ratify it; but the pontiff, who had attained his end in setting at strife the two most formidable monarchies of Christendom, thinking that they would destroy each other, was unwilling to adhere to any treaty. He even pretended that the council of cardinals were opposed to his taking an active part in the struggle, before knowing the determination of the emperor; a detestable excuse, for the holy father not only made good his observation concerning the sacred college, that he did not even permit it to deliberate; but in regard to Ferdinand, he made no hesitation in showing how odious he had become to him, and said openly, that it was only necessary for a claim, even the most lawful, to come from the court of Vienna to be rejected. Thus Ferdinand, having demanded from the pope that St. Stephen and St. Wenceslaus, two former kings of Hungary, should be admitted into the Roman calendar, his holiness had ironically replied that they were unworthy of such an honour. On another occasion, the emperor having solited authority to confer the ecclesiastical employments, rendered free by the edict of restitution, the pope had rejected his request, as trespassing upon the arrangement between the empire and the Holy See; which was false, since the king of France, by virtue of the same concordat of Francis the First, exercised in his dominion precisely the same right which was claimed by Ferdinand. Finally, the latter having asked from Rome permission to transform into colleges of Jesuits, the convents acquired by the edict of restitution, his holiness, instead of acceding to this desire, had ordered him to restore these monasteries immediately to the bishops.

The imbecile monarch remained steadily submissive, contenting himself with saying, that notwithstanding the pope, he would prove himself to be the devoted champion of Catholicism. To add example to precept, he sent three armies to the field; one, which he sent to aid the Poles, who were attacked by the Swedes, and which re-established the affairs of the former; another, which he sent towards the Low Countries, to form a junction with the Spanish troops; and a third, twenty-five thousand strong, which he sent to Italy, to seize on Mantua. At first, all bent before the Germans; Switzerland, which had wished to maintain its neutrality, and refused him a passage, was constrained to yield; the defiles of the Grisons were carried, and the imperial army descended from the summit of the Alps, following the banks of the Adda and the Oglio, and directed itself towards Mantua. The Spaniards, on their side, had penetrated the province of Montferrat, to fight the French, who had seized on Saluces and Pignerol; and these three formidable powers, drawn into Upper Italy by the pontiff, were preparing to cause rivers of blood to flow, to enable the Holy See to triumph.

But what Urban had not foreseen was, that Ferdinand the Second, that prince so devoted to the court of Rome, should at last break the yoke of priests, and carry his boldness so far, as to be willing to reckon with the pope, and claim for himself the sovereignty of Upper Italy. This however happened; the emperor, victorious in Italy, Poland, and the Low Countries, became elated with pride, and informed his holiness that he wished to receive the crown at his hands, and would go to Bologna or Ferrara for the ceremony. Urban dared not refuse him, and only sought to gain time; the court of Vienna penetrated his intentions, demanded explanations, and claimed moreover the sovereignty of the duchies of Urbino and Monte Falco.

As his holiness still hesitated to give a reply, and to declare his determination concerning the new pretensions which the emperor raised to the domains of the church, the fierce Wallenstein, one of the generals of Ferdinand, deliberated whether or not he should go to attack Urban in Rome, giving him to understand that this city had not been pillaged for a century; that since that time, the popes had enriched it with the spoils of other people.

had piled up enormous sums in the cellars of the Vatican, and that he would not disdain so good an opportunity to seize on the immense treasures, raise up the empire of Charlemagne, and make it hereditary in the house of Austria.

These plans appeared the more easy to realise, since no power was in a situation to oppose the wishes of Ferdinand the Second. The Low Countries were invaded, the protestant cities subdued, the king of Denmark conquered; Italy trembled before the imperial armies; France, which was in discord from the troubles which Gaston of Orleans and the queen mother fomented, in order to overthrow the cardinal minister, remained indifferent to what was passing without. Urban the Eighth was beginning to despair of the safety of the church, when he remembered that there dwelt in the extreme north of Europe, a prince formidable for his valour, Gustavus Adolphus, who could make a diversion favourable to the Holy See, by carrying the war into the provinces of the empire. He immediately sent an ambassador to Richelieu, brought him into his views, and managed to conclude an armistice between Poland and Sweden; then, when the war had ceased on that point, his holiness agreed with France to furnish the king of Sweden with the sums necessary for the support of a formidable army destined for the invasion of Germany, imposing on him no other condition than that of tolerating the Catholic religion wherever he found it established, a clause which was kept secret, lest this tolerance should wake the suspicions of the reformed.

At last a general assembly of protestant princes and electors was held at Leipsic, and they decided by common consent to carry on the war against Ferdinand. This coalition, though formidable, would not perhaps have been sufficient to overthrow the powerful house of Austria, which was in the highest degree prosperous, if the confederates had not been seconded in their enterprise by the people, who were anxious to throw off the insupportable yoke of Wallenstein, the favourite of the prince, and one of his most skilful generals, but at the same time the most cruel, the most despotic, the most infamous of his ministers.

Gustavus Adolphus opened the campaign, and moved towards the Lower Oder, driving the German troops before him, and increasing his army by the accession of malcontents. Arrived beneath the walls of Leipsic, he met Count Tilly, routed his army, and pushed rapidly on Mayence, which he carried by assault. All the oppressed princes came to range themselves beneath the standard of the king of Sweden; and the reformed party, shortly before crushed and conquered, found itself in a condition to dictate terms to its oppressors; the protestant ministers immediately returned to the Palatinate, and traversed all the provinces of the empire, in the train of the army of Gustavus Adolphus, to re-awaken the religious enthusiasm.

His holiness could not conceal the joy which the triumph of the king of Sweden and the abasement of the house of Austria afforded him, which provoked energetic representations from the ambassador of Ferdinand. The emperor, informed of this circumstance, wrote to Urban, to testify his discontent, and to inform him, that as soon as he had driven Gustavus Adolphus and his thirty thousand heretics from Germany, he would have a settlement with the Holy See. The holy father replied, by this single phrase, "Alexander conquered the world with thirty thousand Greeks."

Urban showed less regard still for the Spanish cardinals, who, at the instigation of Duke Olivarez, endeavoured to remonstrate with him on his alliance with a protestant sovereign, and the cardinal Borgia having dared in full consistory to represent to him the scandal of his conduct, and to accuse him of labouring for the ruin of religion, he rose from his seat, and vomited forth a torrent of reproaches and blasphemies against the prelate who was bold enough to trace a rule of conduct for the vicar of God; and as the latter was about to reply, on a sign from the pontiff, the cardinal Barberino, who had great strength, fell on Borgia, threw him on the ground, and dragged him by his hair from the hall of the consistory.

After this scene of violence, all the members of the assembly separated in a tumult, the Spaniards loudly announcing that they would call a meeting of a council, to judge the pope and proceed to his condemnation.—The Jesuits even, who saw their power annihilated in Germany, by the invasion of Gustavus Adolphus, showed themselves hostile to Urban; and the confessor of Duke Olivarez, one of the principal dignitaries of the order, published a book on the attributes of the supreme head of the church, and proved by very logical reasoning, that the popes had no canonical power beyond their bishopric of the Lateran, and that they were not more elevated in dignity than other bishops. The court of Madrid found the arguments of the bishops so accordant with their own sentiments, that they deliberated in the council of the Catholic king, whether they should take from the pontiff the collation of the benefices of Spain, and should erect a datary to receive the money levied upon the ecclesiastics of the kingdom, by the Roman church.

Events were on the other hand taking place in Germany, in a very different direction from what the pope had expected. His holiness, in allying himself with the heretics, had counted on concurring in the weakening of the house of Austria, but not in its ruin, which necessarily drew after it that of Catholicism. The king of Sweden appeared to regard as too serious, the mission on which he was employed, of humbling the emperor. His army had invaded Bavaria, after having a second time defeated Tilly, who remained on the field of battle; one of his lieutenants, Duke Bernard of Saxe Weimar, had penetrated into the Tyrol, and threatened Italy with his veteran Swedish bands. It was no longer possible to doubt, that the intentions of Gustavus Adolphus were changed, and that he thought of profiting by his fortune, to cause protestantism to triumph, and transform the bishoprics of Southern Germany into temporal principalities. The prince had already announced that he wished to establish his residence at Augsburg.

Urban then discovered the enormous mistake he had made; he secretly undermined the party of his ally, retarded the payment of his subsidies, entered into correspondence with Ferdinand, gave him the plans of the campaign of the Swedish army, and what was most baneful for Gustavus Adolphus, determined the emperor to give the command of his armies to the terrible Wallenstein, who had been exiled by a court intrigue, and whom he thought the only general capable of coping with the king of Sweden. These two men, both renowned for their military talents, were thus opposed to each other; Gustavus Adolphus was at the head of thirty thousand excellent troops, Wallenstein commanding an army of more than sixty thousand imperialists; the meeting took place in Misnia, in a vast plain which extends between Weissenfels and Lutzen.

At the beginning of the action the Swedish army broke the lines of the imperialists, threw them into disorder, and seized their cannon. Gustavus, wishing to profit by this advantage, commanded his cavalry to charge the main force of Wallenstein, and in order to animate his troops, he charged bareheaded, with a troop of cuirassiers. Whether the command had not been heard by the troops, or whether there was treason on the part of the superior officers, the prince found himself engaged in the midst of his enemies, before he perceived that he was only followed by a small number of horse. He then wished to face about and cut his way through, so as to escape from the melee; it was too late.—Already weakened by the blood which escaped from a large wound in his left arm, assailed on all sides at once, he could only perform prodigies of valour; a blow from a musket which was fired from behind, striking him in the back, unseated him, and one of his feet remaining entangled in the stirrup, he was dragged along the ground by his horse; in this state, he received another blow from a musket, which broke his head. Thus perished this great prince, the zealous protector of protestantism, arrested in his victorious march at the moment he was about to cull the fruit of his courageous efforts, and plant the flag of religious independence on the ruins of the papacy.

Puffendorf and several other historians have affirmed, that Gustavus Adolphus was the victim of an odious treason, and their suspicions rest particularly on Francis Albert, duke of Saxe Lunenburg, the emperor, and the pope; certain it is, that the news of the death of the king of Sweden was received with transports of joy at Vienna and Rome. The death of their chief did not, however, abate the courage of the protestants. The duke of Saxe Weimar, Torstenson, Wrangel, Horn, continued the war successfully, and the chancellor Oxenstiern, by skilful negotiations with France, Germany, and Holland, maintained the ascendancy of Sweden over the Germanic Roman empire.

But Urban knew that the Reformation had lost its most powerful prop, and he did not trouble himself about the struggle between the lieutenants of Gustavus Adolphus and Ferdinand the Second; besides, this war was very useful for his political interests, and permitted him to realise his plans of rule over the principalities of Italy, without fear of being disturbed by the house of Austria.

His holiness availed himself of it to assure to himself possession of the duchy of Urbino, by causing the young duke, the last heir of the house of Rovera, to be assassinated. The old lord Francisco Maria, who had for a long time abdicated in favour of his son, was obliged to resume the reins of government and to free his granddaughter, only a year old, from the ambition of the pontiff, he affianced her to the son of the duke of Tuscany, and sent her to a neighbouring country. Useless precautions! Urban threatened the old duke with a terrible war, and obliged him to recognise, that he held his cities, lands, and domains, as a fief of the Holy See; exacted from him that the officers of his province should take an oath of fidelity to him, and constrained him even to place his fortresses in the hands of his creatures; then, one morning, Francisco Maria was found dead in his bed. The nephew of the pope, Thadeo Barberino, came to take possession of the country, and the duchy of Urbino, with the cities of Pesaro and Sinigaglia, were declared dependencies of the states of the church.

Though his holiness was seriously occupied in increasing the patrimony of St. Peter, he did not neglect the fortune of his own family, and every day he added to their immense wealth by new gifts, so that in less than ten years, the apostolic treasury had been wrung by such enormous loans, that the revenues of the Holy See were no longer sufficient to pay the interest on them; they ciphered up a hundred and five millions of crowns, in money paid into the hands of the nephews of the pope, independently of what had been employed in the purchases of palaces, lands, vineyards, pictures, statues, gold and silver plate, vessels of gold or silver, and precious stones. "The value of all these things," says Fiscarini, "was so great, that it is impossible to believe or tell them."

Never had the excess of nepotism been carried so far by the pontiffs; for Urban, not content with gorging his brothers and nephews with riches, dignities, honours, and benefices, gave bishoprics to their children at the breast; and even, a scandal until then without example, even to those who were in the womb of their mothers. This great love of the pope for his relatives extended to their numerous creatures and flatterers; there was not a lying versifier who was not provided with excellent benefices in recompense for some distich in praise of the Barberini.

If Urban protected the wretches who prostituted their pens in a base and servile adulation, by way of compensation he persecuted men of genius who refused to glorify such great turpitudes; and the celebrated Galileo Galilei, the father of experimental philosophy, was one of those whom he persecuted with most bitterness. This celebrated man had already established the theory of a movement uniformly accelerated, and fixed the rules of isochronism by the oscillations of the pendulum; he had, moreover, made a magnificent discovery, that of optical instruments, which opened a new route for astronomy, and permitted to prove by direct observation, the truths of the system of Copernicus as to the revolution of the earth around the sun.

By means of his telegraph, Galileo plunged into the depths of immensity, and contemplated phenomena which no mortal had yet beheld; the surface of the moon appeared to him to be bristled with mountains and furrowed with deep valleys; Venus, also, as the satellite of the earth, presented to him phases which proved its sphericity; Jupiter also offered itself to his gaze with his four asteroides which constantly accompanied him; the milky way, the nebulous mists, all the heavens, in fine, were exhibited to him, with their thousands of invisible stars. What surprise, what pleasure did the appearance of so many marvels excite in the breast of Galileo. What days were, however, required by this great astronomer, to count all his worlds, and register the result of his admirable discoveries, in a work entitled "The Celestial Courier," which he dedicated to the princess de Medicis.

Galileo then continued the course of his investigations; he observed moveable spots on the sun, and did not hesitate to conclude that this star turned on its axis; he remarked on the dark side of the moon, during the first and last quarters, an ashy light, which was only visible through the telescope, and he judged, with reason, that this effect was owing to the light reflected by the terrestrial globe. His subsequent observations on the spots on the moon, and their periodical return at the same periods, led him to discover that this star always presented the same face to the earth; he studied the movements and the eclipses of the satellites of Jupiter, used them for the measurement of longitudes, and even undertook a sufficiently large number of observations on these stars to construct tables for the use of navigators.

Finally, by discovery on discovery, Galileo was enabled to draw from nature, the mysterious veil which had hidden it from the looks of men; he could admire the sublime laws which govern the universe; the rotation of the earth; its revolution around the sun, the fixedness of that star; all the wonders of those luminous worlds which are drawn up in echelons through immensity up to the very throne of God. Galileo wished to enlighten other men, to lay out a new route for science, and he published his admirable theories. But, unfortunately, he excited the jealous hatred of a pope who had pretensions to omniscience as well as to infallibility, and his protector, the grand duke of Tuscany, who had appointed him his mathematician extraordinary, was not powerful enough to defend him against such enmity. Every where Jesuits, priests, monks, declaimed against Galileo; some maintained that his discoveries among the stars were pure visions, like the imaginary journeys of Astolphus; others affirmed that they had the telescope in their possession for whole nights, and had been unable to see what the astrologer Galileo announced; all loaded him with epigrams in their sermons, or sought to throw him into ridicule. It was thus that the compatriots of Copernicus had acted, who had even turned him into ridicule on the stage.

Galileo continued to publish his labours, without troubling himself about the clamour of the priests; but they determined to attack him before the Holy See, to have his new theories condemned as false and heretical. The celebrated astronomer essayed in vain to calm this tempest, and produced a treatise in the form of an epistle, addressed to the grand duchess of Tuscany, in which he endeavoured to prove theologically, and by quotations from the fathers, that the texts of scripture should not be taken literally, and could be reconciled with the new discoveries regarding the constitution of the world. This production only increased the rage of his enemies; he was accused of sustaining erroneous opinions in matters of faith, of wishing to overthrow religion, and outrage the majesty of God. He was accordingly cited to appear in person at Rome, to be condemned by an assembly of cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and theologians, assembled under the presidency of his holiness Urban the Eighth. This cabal of ignorant, stupid, and fanatical priests, having no regard for this illustrious old man, refused even to hear the reasons he offered in favour of his theories, and pronounced the following declaration:—In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, we, all assembled in this place, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, enlightened by the intelligence of the sovereign pontiff, decide that none of the faithful has a right to believe and maintain, that the sun is placed immoveable in the centre of the world. We decide that this theory is false and absurd in theology, as well as heretical, because it is expressly contrary to the words of scripture, and would imply an accusation of ignorance against God, the source of all science and the revealer of the sacred books. We also prohibit it from being taught that the earth is not placed in the centre of the universe, that it is not immoveable, and that it has a daily movement of rotation, because, this second proposition is from the same reasons false and absurd, even in philosophy, as well as erroneous as a matter of faith.

Galileo wished to reply, and to produce arguments which the truth suggested to him, in defence of a doctrine based on irrefutable facts; but the pope imposed silence on him, and declared that by virtue of his infallibility he decided that the earth was immoveable, and that the universe was governed by the laws pointed out in Genesis; finally, he prohibited him from professing his new theories in future.

Although condemned, the noble old man, on his return to Florence, did not pursue with less ardour than before, the study of those sublime truths of which he regarded himself as the depositary; and, to prevent this precious treasure from perishing, he collected into one work all the physical proofs of the double movement of the earth upon its own axis, and around the sun, and of its relations with the other planets in the solar system. To render these truths palpable, and to exhibit them to every mind, Galileo did not compose a treatise, but simple dialogues between two of the most distinguished personages of Venice and Florence, and a third interlocutor, who, under the name of Simplicius, reproduced the arguments of the theologians, and the scholastic philosophy. He then went to Rome and boldly presented his work to the master of the sacred palace, begging him to examine it with a scrupulous attention, to lop from it all that appeared to him suspicious, and to censure it with the greatest severity. The prelate, unsuspecting of any after thought in the author, read and re-read the work, even confided it to one of his colleagues, who also saw nothing in it to blame, and gave it an ample approval under his own hand. Galileo, overjoyed at having succeeded in his ruse, returned to Florence, and immediately printed his work.

The dialogues, on their appearance, excited an extraordinary uproar among the theologians and Jesuits; they all cried out scandal, and demanded the punishment of the guilty. Urban, who recognised himself in the person of Simplicius, and whose vanity was wounded, listened to the complaints of the clergy, and, notwithstanding the representations of the author, who entrenched himself behind the authority given to his book by the censor, notwithstanding his formal protestations of not having wished to attack religion, but only to lay open the two systems of Ptolemy and Copernicus, without adopting either of the two opinions, notwithstanding the protection of the grand duke of Tuscany, his holiness went on, handed him over to the tribunal of the inquisition, and ordered him to appear in person before the dreadful judges of the holy office. Galileo was constrained to obey; neither the feebleness of his health, nor the rheumatic pains with which he was tormented, nor his great age (he was then seventy) could moderate the sacerdotal hatred.

"I arrived at Rome," says he in one of his letters, "on the 16th of February, 1633, and I was delivered over to the clemency of the inquisition, and the sovereign pontiff, who had no esteem for me, because I did not know how to rhyme an epigram and a small love sonnet. I was at first confined in the palace of the Trinity of the Mount; on the next day, I was visited by Father Lancio, the commissary of the holy office, who took me with him in his carriage. During the ride, he put different questions to me, and showed a great desire that I should repair the offence I had given to all Italy, by maintaining the opinion of the earth's motion; and to all the mathematical proofs which I could offer him, he replied to me by these words of scripture: 'The earth shall be immoveable for eternity, because it is immoveable from eternity.' Thus discoursing, we arrived at the palace of the sacred office; I appeared before a tribunal appointed not to judge me, but to condemn me. I went to work, however, to give my proofs. What pains soever I took, I could not make them comprehend me; they cut short all my reasonings by bursts of zeal, and always opposed to me the passage of scripture concerning the victory of Joshua, as the victorious piece in my trial. In turn, I quoted those strange words of the holy books in which it is said, 'That the heavens are solid and polished like a brazen mirror,' to prove that we should not interpret scripture literally, if we wished the people who are not plunged in barbarous degradation, to preserve some belief in the dogmas of religion; they only replied to me by reproaches."

At the close of this first interrogatory, Galileo was confined in the infected dungeons of the holy office, where he remained for several months; then, when they supposed that suffering, bad treatment, and a forced fast had weakened his moral energy, they brought him out; but, as he showed the same obstinacy, his holiness caused him to be conducted to the chamber of torture. The unfortunate old man underwent several times the punishment of the cord, with the greatest courage, and without admitting his guilt. Finally, his body broken by the terrible shocks of the strappado, and conquered by his horrid pains, Galileo asked pardon, and declared that his work was filled with abominable falsehoods. He was then brought before the tribunal to pronounce his abjuration there, which he did in these terms, "I, Galileo, in the seventieth year of my age, being on my knees before the most eminent lords, having before my eyes the holy gospel, which I touch with my own hands, abjure, detest, and curse the error and heresy of the motion of the earth."

It is said, that after having pronounced this abjuration, the old man, filled with the sublime sentiments of truth, rose, and striking the earth with his foot, exclaimed, "and yet it turns." When his expiation was achieved, they tore up his dialogues, and condemned him to prison for an indefinite period. Such was the reward which Pope Urban the Eighth granted to the admirable labours of one of the greatest genius of the human race.

Whilst the papacy was persecuting in Italy, the learned whose intelligence it feared; in France, royalty continuing to trample under foot the sacred rights of humanity, was persecuting the men who gave it umbrage, or the citizens whose wealth excited its covetousness, and was burning them alive, as addicted to judicial astrology or alchemy. Thousands of innocent persons were thus sent to the stake on accusation of sorcery of a revolting absurdity; and a Richelieu, a cardinal, a first minister, a priest who ought necessarily to know how to treat such superstitions, was infamous enough to employ this means of ridding himself of those who were in his way, or to increase his treasures.

At his instigation, the Jesuits inveighed against the sorcerers, as they had done against the protestants, that is, against those who had inspired fears in the royalty or papacy. In order to excite the passions of the people against their victims, the disciples of Ignatius Loyola spread frightful calumnies about them. They accused them of casting curses on men, women and animals, to cause them to perish, or inflict upon them incurable infirmities; they said that they had power, by means of magical operations, to raise demons, destroy flocks, excite tempests, bring forth from the earth millions of insects and dangerous reptiles, to corrupt the air and water, and give birth to cruel murrains. They affirmed that these pretended sorcerers sought constantly to recruit new disciples for Satan, and that they nightly presented to their master, those whom they had seduced, men or women; they said that the prince of darkness appeared to them under different forms and exacted from them frightful oaths, to be assured of their fidelity, and that he impressed on their sexual organs certain indelible characters; that he then taught them to prepare beverages composed of the juices of venomous plants, of the brains of wild cats, and of the entrails of children in the cradle, and in which the sorcerers, his pupils, sometimes mixed pieces of the consecrated host, which they took from their mouths on the day of communion; that he showed them moreover how to make powders of different colours, to bring on diseases or to cure them; some black, which were mortal; others red, which caused violent fevers; and, finally, white powders to cure all sorts of diseases.

The learned fathers of the Society of Jesus also maintained, that the adepts of the evil spirit, under the presidency of their masters, held nocturnal meetings in vast plains, or in dark and remote forests; that they travelled through the air mounted on a goat, a dog without a head, or a broom handle. That some went up the chimney, placing their left foot on the pot hooks, besmeared first with an infernal drug with which they anointed their whole body; that others went out of the windows, and some even passed out through the locks of their doors; that these journeys were performed with incredible promptitude, and that the sorcerers and sorceresses only experienced an extreme lassitude in their limbs.

There, according to the Jesuits, passed sacrilegious honours, between the prince of darkness and his acolytes; the orgies commenced with a magnificent festival; meats, admirably prepared, were served up to the guests in vessels of gold or silver, only the viands were putrid, and did not satiate. Satan presided over this banquet in the form of a he goat, a dog, or a black cat, or in that of a horse with the head of a wolf, or of a wolf with the head of a horse. After the repast he addressed them in an idiom which belonged to no human language; they then rose to dance to the sound of strange instruments; a club served as a flute, a horse's head, stripped of the flesh, for a violin, and for a drum, one of them struck with a mace on the trunk of an old oak, and to the noise of this horrible music, rendered more frightful still by the hoarse cries and howlings with which they intermingled it, the sorcerers and sorceresses stripped off their clothes, turned around dancing, their backs supported against each other, and men and women mixed, without choice or distinction, or age or sex, in horrible embraces. Satan clothed himself, by turns, in the form of a beautiful young girl or a handsome youth, and took possession of all, male and female, outraging nature. When they were tired of licentiousness, they hailed Satan, and thanked him for the feast he had given them.

Evil to those who did not return thanks to the demon; they were at once beaten unmercifully; finally, before separating, all came to kneel before the spirit of darkness, depositing at his feet certain offerings, to purchase exemptions from the misfortunes he could inflict upon them, or for the services they owed him. Some gave him black fowls, others small black dogs; if they failed in their offerings they were punished by domestic misfortunes, by the sickness or death of their children; for, when they once surrendered themselves to Satan, he governed them with a rigor scarcely credible; he maltreated them, smote them, afflicted them with sickness for the least disobedience, for being absent at a nocturnal meeting, for having come too late, for having restored some one to health without his permission, or for having refused to poison their neighbours when he commanded them to.

Such were the superstitions which the Jesuits propagated at the commencement of the seventeenth century; it resulted that the people, always lovers of the marvellous, believed in sorcerers, and could soon only speak of magic, sorcery, witchcraft. The most ordinary events were every where attributed to supernatural causes; and when the priests or rulers wished to rid themselves of an enemy, they had only to point him out as one of those who was in intercourse with the prince of darkness.

This belief became so general, that it reached the highest classes of society; thus, the young Princess Catherine of Lorraine being attacked with a lingering sickness, of the cause of which the men of science were ignorant, the priests maintained that a spell had been cast on her, and they accused a gentleman named Tremblecourt of doing it. On this more accusation, the unfortunate man was arrested, conducted to the chateau de Châte, and put to the torture; as he was unwilling to avow his pretended crime of magic, he was tortured and torn until death followed. We should, however, say that he was guilty of having spoken against some powerful ecclesiastics in his diocese, and that he was suspected of inclining towards the reformed. The sorcerer being dead, they began to exorcise the princess, and the bishop designated for this purpose, a Capuchin lay brother, named Felix de Cantalice. The latter came at once to the castle of the duke of Lorraine, and was conducted to the bed chamber of the beautiful Catherine, and commanded that he should be left alone with her all night, that he might perform his exorcisms without being disturbed by external distractions. But, unfortunately, the duke of Lorraine having wished to satisfy himself as to the means which the Capuchin employed to effect this miraculous cure, entered the chamber of his daughter one night, and was not a little surprised to find them asleep in each others arms; he could not restrain his anger, but fell upon the guilty pair and strangled the seducer. On the next day it was reported that the Carmelite had fallen in a strife with the evil spirit, and to give the more credence to this fable, the duke Charles of Lorraine, sent ambassadors to Urban the Eighth, to solicit the canonization of the blessed Felix de Cantalice, which the pope granted on the payment of sixty thousand livres, being the tax which new saints were to pay to be enrolled on the matriculation book of the Roman court.

The example spread far and wide, and every province had, like Lorraine, its sorcerers and its exorcists; the small city of Loudun in Poitou, became, among others, the theatre of a terrible strife between a legion of demons evoked by the curate Urban Grandier, and the fathers of a convent of Carmelites, sustained by some venerable Jesuits; the following is the case. The city of Loudun contained a convent of Ursulines, composed of young ladies of noble families and without fortune; the post of director of these beautiful nuns was assuredly a very agreeable one; so that after the death of the priest who was their confessor, several candidates appeared. The curate of the city, named Urban Grandier, was among them, and was rejected because he had condemned, from his pulpit, the Carmelites who carried on intercourse with the nuns, because he had attacked some odious privileges of the nobility, and, especially, because he had written a vehement satire, under the title of the Shoemaker of Loudun, against the cardinal minister. A canon of the church of the Holy Cross, named Mignon, was put in possession of the post of director of these girls. The canon Mignon had exercised his post of confessor for some months, when, suddenly, strange things were spoken of as occurring in the convent of the Ursulines; the rumour was spread abroad that spectres and phantoms appeared every night to the nuns, and that several of them were agitated by strange symptoms; and very naturally, according to the ideas of the time, these phenomena were attributed to the devil. The director assembled several Carmelites and canons, and examined in their presence three Ursulines, who declared that they were labouring under a charm of the curate Urban Grandier; that the witchcraft had been performed by means of a branch of flowering roses thrown into the convent, so that all who had smelt the roses had been spell bound.

Grandier, finding himself personally attacked, accused the canon Mignon of calumny, and went before the judges and the bishop of Poitiers, who refused to have any thing to do with it; he then addressed himself to the archbishop of Bordeaux, who was at his abbey of St. Jouin, near to Loudun, and endeavoured, with his assistance, to put an end to the clamours of the religious possessed. Things were in this condition when the counsellor of state, Laubardemont, the tool of Richelieu, came to Loudun to superintend the demolition of the fort of that city; the enemies of the curate hastened to inform him of what had occurred in the monastery of the Ursulines, of which the superior, Sister Jeanne des Anges, was his relative. On his return he gave an account to the cardinal of this singular affair. Richelieu, delighted at being enabled to be avenged on the author of a satire which had unmasked him, immediately sent back Laubardemont to Loudun, with a royal commission, to take informations against Grandier.

The curate was arrested and conducted to the castle of Angers; his papers were seized, but nothing was found against him except a manuscript against the celibacy of the priests, which, if we are to believe Bayle, was falsely added to his papers by his enemies. As, however, the order of Richelieu was formal, the proceedings were conducted with all care; and the judges, failing in material testimony, subsidised false witnesses. Two women of loose life declared, that they had criminal commerce with the accused; and one of them avowed that he had intoxicated her with infinite pleasures to induce her to consent to become a priestess of the magicians. The Ursulines accused him of having introduced himself by day and night into their convent, of having appeared to them under all forms, of having abused them now in the form a beautiful swan, of a bull, of a serpent—sometimes in the form of a handsome youth, and even in that of their director Mignon; and as an irrefutable proof, they argued from their gross conditions, which was confirmed by physicians and matrons. They proceeded to new exorcisms; the nuns made the same avowals always, and accused Urban Grandier of being the author of their misfortune from his compact with the devil.

The judges, who were all sold to Richelieu, adopted these ridiculous accusations, and pushed impudence so far as to attest, that at different times during the exorcisms they had seen three demons escape from the body of Sister Jeane des Anges, the superior of the Ursulines, one in the form of a black cat, by the nostrils; another, under that of a cock, by the arms; and a third in flame of blood colour, by her private parts. This monstrous proceeding terminated, Laubardemont sent the papers to the cardinal minister, and he appointed a commission of fourteen magistrates of his creatures, taken from different jurisdictions, to judge, or rather to condemn, the unfortunate curate. This great iniquity was accomplished on the 18th of August, 1634. Urban Grandier was declared to be attainted and convicted of the crime of magic, witchcraft, and possession of the devil on the persons of the holy Ursulines of Loudun, and to be condemned to beg pardon with naked head, to be tortured and burned alive, with the magical compacts and characters which the nuns had deposited in the registry.

Before being conducted to punishment, the unfortunate man was put to the extraordinary torment of the boot, and frightfully tormented, in order to arrest an avowal from him; but frightful as was the punishment, he bore it to the end, and persisted in declaring himself innocent of the crime of magic. "The true motive for this persecution against Urban Grandier," says Nicholas Pinette, in his memoirs, "was not magic, for I, who write this, assisted at the ceremonies of the exorcisms of the sisters of Loudun, and I can affirm that they played a ridiculous and execrable farce, which did not impose upon the judges. The proof of this is, that after the condemnation they were dispossessed, and returned to their habitual mode of life. . ."

Urban the Eighth learned of the judicial assassination of Grandier, and the history of the devils of Loudun, with a mixture of indignation and pity; but he was careful of refusing credence to facts which were attested to him by the reverend fathers of the Society of Jesus, the witnesses of these prodigies, and by a stupid lord named Montague, who, a dupe to this jugglery, had come to Rome to turn Catholic.

The imbecile Louis the Thirteenth believed firmly that his kingdom was assailed by legions of devils, and imagined that by placing it under the protection of the Virgin, he could guard it from their charms. The following is the royal edict: "We consecrate in an especial manner our person, our sceptre, our diadem, and all our subjects to the blessed and ever glorious mother of God, whom we now take for the special patron of our kingdom of France."

This affair was but an insignificant episode for Richelieu. A Catholic from calculation, he persecuted the Huguenots, the sorcerers, and the men of letters who dared to write against the papacy, whilst he was forming alliances with the protestants of Germany, whilst he was striving with the English, whilst he was preparing means to free France from obedience to the pope and have himself made patriarch of the Gauls. He had already brought into his views a skilful and wary Italian ecclesiastic, named Mazarin, and who filled the post of nuncio extraordinary at the court of France; he had already adjudged all the regular abbeyes, and placed at their head priors devoted to his person, so as to form useful auxiliaries when the time for the struggle with the Holy See arrived.

But the pope, who had divined his plans, went to work to defeat them. He immediately sent an order to the nuncio Mazarin to quit the court of France, and to go to the country of Avignon, in the capacity of vice legate, an injunction to which that prelate was obliged to submit, to the great displeasure of Richelieu, who wished to send him to Spain or Germany, to detach the sovereigns of those countries from the cause of Rome; he then informed the cardinal minister that he must resign his ambition if he did not wish to be pointed out to the nations as an enemy of religion. Following the example of his holiness, they soon had no respect at Rome for France or its representatives. One of the nephews of the pope dared to kill, with his own hand, the grand equerry of the marshal d'Estrees, the French ambassador, because he did not bow low enough when saluting his eminence; and another did not fear to poison the daughter-in-law of the marshal, who was his mistress, and was with child by him, lest he should be compelled to marry her.

In vain did the ambassador demand the punishment of the guilty; his holiness would hear nothing, and even interdicted the marshal from entering his palace and the consistory. The latter retired immediately to Caprarole, to the duke of Parma, who was in hostilities with the Holy See, and sent to the court of France an account of what had occurred, in order that it might exact a brilliant reparation for the insults offered to the nation in the person of its ambassador. Richelieu would not, however, make any representation to the holy father, and by his silence appeared to approve of what had been done. The wary cardinal did so to increase the boldness and insolence of Urban, and to avoid all discussions with the court of Rome, until the time came when he was ready to strike the great blow, that is to say, to free France from obedience to the popes. In order to insure the success of this important enterprise, it only remained for him to bring the Jesuits into his interests, and he laboured actively in favouring the tendencies of these holy fathers towards temporal grandeur.

Since the commencement of the century, the disciples of Ignatius Loyola had introduced into their statutes important modifications, which were insensibly to relax the bonds of discipline, and produce great changes in the order. Thus the professed, who had never before exercised but an intellectual control over their brethren, were put in possession of administrative charges, with the right of sharing in the revenues of the colleges, and the other benefices of the society; it followed naturally that they lost a great part of their moral influence, and relaxed gradually from their severity in the admission of new members, in order to increase their revenues. The colleges were soon encumbered by greedy and interested persons, who made no scruple in departing from the duties which their title of Jesuits imposed on them of defending the papacy, and only thought of the means of reaching rapidly the highest grades of the order, which gave at once spiritual authority and temporal power, and permitted them to enjoy in idleness the wealth which flowed into the treasury of the society from all quarters.

Having once entered on this path, the Jesuits of France did not stop; and these men, before so austere, so humble, so disinterested, did not fear to exhibit their immoderate love of money in open day; they became courtiers, merchants, bankers; they managed the affairs of laymen, looked after law suits, and directed commercial enterprises. Their professed houses became themselves the counting houses and centres of great industry, which gradually extended into the two hemispheres, and produced enormous advantages to their colleges established in different parts of the world.

Up to this time they had observed the principle of their society in regard to the gratuitous instruction of children; having become more greedy from the very accumulation of riches, they began to depart, if not openly, at least by accepting presents for the admission of pupils, and seeking from preference scholars whose families were powerful.

They were no longer engaged in propagating the faith, and conquering the world for Catholicism; on the contrary, they endeavoured to bend religion to meet the wants of their material interests; and not only did they change the constitution of their order, but they even altered the doctrines of Christianity, and corrupted its morality. Their theologians published numerous works on the nature of sin, and declared that it was only a voluntary departure from the commandment, and that consequently men were not guilty, except from the previous knowledge of the fault, and the deliberate wish to commit it.

This principle adopted, they developed it with incredible scholastic subtlety, and drew from it the strangest consequences. According to this doctrine it was sufficient that an occasional, or necessary cause, should have acted on our free will, or even the liberty of our will, not to have sinned, even in committing parricide. A violent passion, habit, bad examples, were an excuse to justify the greatest crimes. The fathers, Thomas Tamburini, Suarez, Basenbaum, Bellarmine, Emanuel Sa, Sanchez, and a multitude of casuists, composed enormous books on these matters. We will be content with relating some of their dissertations, that the reader may judge of the degree of immorality which these infamous priests had reached, and to be enabled to comprehend the just indignation which drove them out of every country, and the reprobation, which down to our own day, attaches to the name of Jesuit.

"It is a great blessing and a precious grace," say the children of Ignatius Loyola, "not to know God; for sin being an injury to the Divinity, if there was no knowledge of God, there would be necessarily neither sin, nor eternal damnation; thus the atheist, since he does not believe in the existence of God, cannot commit any action condemnable by the church, even though he should wish to. . . . It is certain that we can lawfully adore all sorts of inanimate things, and even animals, although it may appear to be blameable at the first sight; we can also render worship to the creature, or any parts of his body, even those of shame, because the church permits us to adore God in his works; however, as in prostrating ourselves, or in kissing those things, we might pass for superstitious, we should not do it publicly."

"When the gentile and pagans adore idols, as they firmly believe that their idols represent the Divinity, they do not commit sin."

"We are not bound to believe in the dogmas of religion or its mysteries, in order to be saved; it is enough that one should have had faith once, though only for a second during his whole life. So with regard to love for God; we are not bound to love him, but through a certain decency, which tells us he is worthy of our love; but in conscience one is not bound to love him, not more than to serve him with sincerity of heart."

"To hear mass, it is enough to be present whilst the priest officiates; a bad disposition of mind, as that of regarding women with the eyes of concupiscence, is not enough to lose the merits of this sacrifice for us, provided that we are externally continent."

"It is not a great sin for young girls to abandon themselves to love before marriage, nor for women to receive the embraces of other men, and be unfaithful to their husbands, under certain circumstances. Thus, when the chaste Susanna of the Holy Scriptures exclaims, 'If I abandon myself to the shameful desires of these old men, I am lost,' she was in error. As she feared infamy on the one hand, and death on the other, she should say, 'I will not consent to a shameful action, but I will endure it, and I will tell it to no one, in order to preserve my life and honour.'"

"Young women without experience think that to be chaste they must call for aid, and resist their seducers with all their strength; it is not so. They are equally pure if they are quiet and do not resist. We sin but by consent and co-operation. Had Susanna permitted the old men to exercise their licentiousness upon her, without taking part internally, it is certain she would not have been guilty. . . . Moreover, concupiscence is not bad, either of itself or in itself; it is a thing of indifference, and one is not blameable for touching or regarding all his body, and even that of another, whether in the bath or elsewhere, if he finds it useful or agreeable; a man and a woman, who are strangers, may enrolle in the presence of each other, until the very last garment, without committing a sin. A young woman may, without wrong, be particular in her attire, in order to provoke the carnal desires of man, use paint and perfumes, adorn herself with superfluous ornaments, wear fine and delicate garments which show her bosom, and the contour of her limbs, provided the world permits it."

"A man does not commit a sin, be he monk or priest even, who having gone to a place of debauchery to talk of morality to harlots, though he should succumb to temptation, even although he had frequently proved that he was liable to be seduced by the sight and cajoleries of these women of love. The intention which led him into these temples of pleasure, is enough to preserve him from sin. So a domestic who is compelled, for a living, to serve a licentious master, may fulfil the vilest and most shameful functions, without ceasing to be in a state of grace; he may procure courtezans for him, and point out improper places; may aid him to scale a window to accomplish a rape, or an abduction. A serving woman may also favour the intrigues of her mistress, introduce her lovers without the knowledge of her father or husband, carry letters, and acquit herself of all little employments of this kind, without drawing on herself any consequences."

"Robbery is not a sin under certain circumstances; a woman may, unknown to her husband, take from the common purse, as much as she may judge necessary for pious donations; she may steal to spend at her leisure, whether in play, on her toilet, or even to pay her lovers, provided she gives half to the church. Children may also on the same conditions, take from their parents, for their little pleasures, all the money that their condition authorises them to spend; domestics may rob their masters by way of compensation, if their wages are too small, and divide with the priests: finally, whosoever robs a rich man without inconveniencing him, acquires the right of lawful possession, if he employs a part in pious works, and he may, without sin, say boldly that in justice he has robbed him of nothing."

"If, however, the conscience recoiled before a false oath, one might murder the words of the formula in pronouncing them, so as to be beyond all suspicion of sin; for example, instead of 'juro,' which signifies I swear, he might pronounce 'uro,' which signifies I burn, and thus would only commit a venial sin. It is, moreover, permitted in light or grave matters to take an oath, without intending to take one; in this case, one is not obliged to keep it. If a judge summons one to keep his sworn faith, he may refuse and say, 'No, I have not promised any thing,' because that may mean, 'I have not promised with a promise which compels me.' Without this subterfuge, he might be condemned to pay that which he does not wish to reimburse, or to espouse the girl whom he does not wish to take for a wife."

"Then, if you have slain another man in lawfully defending yourself, you may affirm, under the sanction of an oath, that you had not slain him, with this mental restriction, 'if he had not attacked me.' If you are surprised by a father in the apartment of his daughter, and he wishes to force you to make him a promise of marriage, you may swear boldly that you will espouse her, with this mental reservation, 'If I am constrained to it, or she please me in the end.' A shopkeeper whose wares are sold too low, may use false weights; and he may deny before the judge that he has used false weights, with this mental reservation, 'by which the purchaser has suffered unjustly.' So we may testify before justice of supposed things, by the aid of mental reservation; thus we may depose, not only to what we have heard one say, but we may even invent feigned facts, and receive money for false testimony without scruple, provided we hand over a part of it to the church."

The doctrines of the good fathers concerning sodomy, the amorous intercourse of women with each other, the shameful turpitudes of bestiality, were as frightful as those they taught concerning perjury, prostitution, robbery, and adultery; but we are compelled to pass them by in silence, on account of the obscenity of the monstrous scenes which these venerable Jesuits trace in their works, with an affectation of complacency, omitting no detail, nor allowing any occasion of showing their prodigious knowledge in such matters to escape. They were also very indulgent for murders, poisonings, even for parricide.

"If a monk," they say, "though well informed of the danger which he runs in being surprised in adultery, enters armed into the house of a woman with whom he has had amorous intercourse, and kills her husband in defence of his life, it is not irregular, and he may continue his ecclesiastical functions. If a priest, being at the altar, is attacked by a jealous husband, he may lawfully break off from the celebration of the holy mysteries to kill him who attacks him, and at once, with his hands covered with blood, return to the altar and achieve the sacrifice of the mass."

"A son may make vows for the death of his father, that he may enjoy his inheritance; a mother may desire the death of her daughter to avoid being obliged to support and endow her; a priest may wish for the death of his bishop, in order to succeed him, because it is less the evil of his neighbour than his own good he desires;—a son who in a moment of intoxication has killed his father, may rejoice in the murder he has committed, on account of the great good it may bring him, and his joy has nothing reprehensible in it;—a son may kill his father when the latter is banished, or declared a traitor to the state or religion;—Catholic children may denounce their parents, if they are heretics, though they know this crime draws after it the penalty of death for the authors of their days; and if they inhabit a protestant country, they may murder them without fear or remorse."

Such were the doctrines propagated by the satellites of the court of Rome, by the servants of the popes, by that infamous company of Jesuits, who had the control of the education of youth, and the government of consciences. During more than fifty years, one of these shameless priests, the Jesuit Escobar, dared to affirm in his works that it was no sin to practise the act of sodomy, and yet he preserved the privilege of confessing artless young girls, and of preaching his detestable system of morals from the chair of truth. Another disciple of Ignatius Loyola, named Busenbaum, dared to write that one might drink without measure and without sin, provided he stopped whilst he could distinguish a man from a hay cart; and yet he remained in the post of rector in the college of Hildesheim and Munster, with the approval of the Holy See.

We must not believe that the excessive indulgence of the popes for the Jesuits could any longer draw closer the bonds which attached them to Catholicism; no, the time of devotion had passed. Some casuists, led on by the ardour of religious disputes, attacked the doctrines and mysteries of religion, and no longer respected the altar by which they lived. Father Guimenius wrote that it was not necessary to believe in the mysteries of the Trinity and the Incarnation in order to be saved, that otherwise, and contrary to all justice, those who were born deaf and dumb would be damned. "The Christian religion," adds the learned Jesuit, "is credible; but not evident, for it teaches obscure things; still more, those who admit that this religion is evidently true, are forced to admit that it is evidently false. Conclude from this, that there is no evidence that there ever has been a true religion upon earth; for from whence do we know, that of all the religions which have existed or which do exist, that of Christ's is the most truthful? Have the oracles of the prophets been given by the Spirit of God? I deny it! Are the miracles attributed to Jesus Christ true? I affirm they are not. It is true that it is convenient to make simple men believe any thing false; it is on that account that I approve of the gospel and all the holy books."

Father Tamburini, in his doctrine of probabilities, goes still farther: "It is permitted," says he, "to follow now one opinion, now another, in matters of religion, as in all other matters. It is probable that Christ made himself a man; it is probable that Jupiter transformed himself into a bull. Am I then to believe it? Yes. The contrary is also probable, and I may equally affirm it." The same author, passing on to other considerations, adds, "It is probable, for example, that a certain impost has been unjustly laid upon a province; it is probable also, that it has been justly laid. Am I then, in my capacity of collector, to exact it conscientiously? Yes. Am I equally, as a contributor, to refuse it? I will reply yes, also."

As these good fathers had composed manuals for the faithful of all professions, in which all cases of conscience were related, explained, and excused, it was enough for a man to regulate his conduct according to their prescriptions, to be assured of being in a state of continual grace.

But the age was too far advanced, and intelligence too generally diffused, for such doctrines not to excite an energetic opposition; as the system of this pernicious doctrine of morals reposed entirely on dogmatical ideas, of which free will was the basis, it was precisely on this principle that their enemies attacked them. This struggle, the most terrible which the Jesuits had to sustain, and which was to place in question the very existence of the society, commenced thus singularly.

At the time when the celebrated Louis Molina was publishing his works on grace, and dividing the theologians of every country into two camps, two young students, the one a Hollander, named Cornelius Jansenius, the other a Gascon, named Duverger de Hauranne, were pursuing their studies in the university of Louvain, then in opposition to the Jesuit Molina. Both adopted the doctrines taught in their college, and conceived a violent hatred against their adversaries, which increased with their years, and which was afterwards to produce terrible consequences for the Molinists. Duverger and Jansenius went to Paris to finish their studies, and then went to Bayonne, called by the bishop of that city to take the direction of a college which he had founded there. Jansenius filled the post of head master until he was thirty-two years old, and only left it to return to Louvain, where he had been appointed principal of the college of St. Pulcherie. Some time afterwards he was made doctor in theology; he afterwards occupied the chair of sacred literature, and was finally promoted to the dignity of bishop of Ypres, which he preserved only a few years, having fallen a victim to a pestilence which broke out in his diocese.

It was an error that the Molinists thought themselves delivered from one of their most formidable enemies. Jansenius had died a victim to his charity, in succouring those attacked with the disease; but his works remained, and the glorious end of their author gave them an extraordinary value.

One of them, the Marqallien, divided into twenty-eight chapters, which formed as many bitter satires against sovereigns, attacked royalty in front, unveiled the crimes of the kings of France from Clovis to Louis the Thirteenth, and had already obtained a prodigious renown throughout Europe. But this success was nothing compared with that which was to greet his last work, called the Augustinus, and which had not yet been printed. In this book, which was written principally against the Jesuits, the author developed the formulas concerning grace, sin, and its remission, with rigour and clearness; he demonstrated in it, that the principle which rules them is the negation of liberty or human will, that the soul is enchained in the bonds of concupiscence, and cannot be freed but by the aid of grace or spiritual delights; that is to say, that our will is determined to will and execute what God has dictated. Jansenius also made God the source of justice and truth, or rather he recognised truth itself as God, for it is the most sublime expression of the Divine Being.

Whilst the illustrious bishop of Ypres was composing the Augustinus, his friend Duverger de Hauranne, who had returned to Paris, was seeking there to realise by the practices of his life the perfection of his doctrine, and was labouring to propagate its essential ideas. His principles were adopted by a great number of ecclesiastics, and among others by la Rocheposay, the bishop of Poitiers, who being very anxious to have him about his person, gave him the post of a canon in his cathedral. Duverger could not accustom himself to the slothful and idle life of the canons, and resigned his post for the dignity of the abbot of St. Cyran. He soon, however, determined to quit Poitiers, to return to Paris, and to abandon himself to his zeal for proselytism on a large theatre. He devoted himself to the direction of consciences, and soon obtained a reputation for piety and knowledge which attracted to him numerous disciples and ardent friends in the highest classes of society. Bishops, magistrates, ministers of state, monasteries of nuns, persons of the most eminent piety, all consulted him and received his advice with the most profound respect, and extreme docility. Sebastian Zamet, bishop of Langres, conceived so great an affection for him, that he even wished to appoint him his coadjutor, a dignity which the abbot of St. Cyran refused, as well as the title of bishop of Bayonne, which the cardinal minister offered him, from a motive of personal interest, and to make a creature of the learned friend of Jansenius.

Soon after, Zamet presented his protegee to the celebrated Mother Agnes Arnaud, abbess of Port Royal, and to the sister of Agnes, named Mother Angelica, abbess of the convent of the Holy Sacrament, associated with this abbey, and which was afterwards suppressed by order of the king; which compelled the holy girls to unite with the nuns of Port Royal.

This pious residence then obtained, thanks to the solicitation of the friends of the bishop of Langres, the privilege of being consecrated into an aggregate body of monks and nuns, under the direction of an abbess. Duverger de Hauranne, appointed director of the community, could then put in execution the plans which he meditated, and attack the infamous doctrines of the Jesuits. These, furious at finding themselves unmasked, lanced libellous publications against the abbot of St. Cyran, excited the jealous hatred of the cardinal minister against him, pushed their audacity so far as to accuse him of heresy, and obtained an order to confine him in the dungeon of Vincennes.

Laubardemont, the same who had figured in the affair of Urban Grandier, was commissioned to carry on this new proceeding, and to have a condemnation pronounced.

It was at this moment, that they learned in France of the death of Jansenius, and the appearance of the Augustinus. Attention was not however given immediately to this work, the minds of men being too much occupied with the enterprises of the cardinal minister against the papacy. Richelieu obtained a decree from parliament, prohibiting information being given to the apostolic nuncio, who were the subjects appointed to consistorial benefices; at the same time, he declared null the enrolment of some briefs which the parliament of Burgundy had promulgated of its own accord; he had moreover published in the name of the two brothers Dupuy, a work entitled, "The Rights and Liberties of the Gallican Church;" finally, the Jesuits, always by his inspiration, had produced writings filled with direct attacks upon the papacy, and in which the good fathers endeavoured to prove that the creation of a patriarch in France was not schismatic, and that the consent of Rome was no more necessary, than it had been at the time of the establishment of the patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Constantinople.

Urban the Eighth was extremely offended at the work of the French Jesuits; he handed it over to the inquisition at Rome, and had it condemned as containing pernicious maxims, contrary to the hierarchical order, and the jurisdiction of the church. Although the holy father knew well from whence the blow came, he dared not strike the true culprit, and dissembled his resentment; he did more—he sent to beseech the marshal d'Estrées to return to Rome, and obliged his nephew, who had poisoned the daughter-in-law of the ambassador, to go to meet him, as a sign of repentance for what had occurred; he even advanced the promotion of two cardinals, to give the hat to the nuncio Mazarin, and thus testified his inclination to satisfy the desires of Richelieu.

The cause of this excessive condescendence to the French minister was simply caused by the desire of his holiness to obtain the condemnation of the Augustinus of Jansenius in France. But it was not in the power of a man to prevent the propagation of a work which had produced a profound and universal sensation; the theologians of Paris applied themselves to the study of the Augustinus of Ypres, and had commented on it in every way; the Jesuits had taken the side of the pope, and had attacked the common enemy. Through all Europe the clergy was divided into two camps; nothing else was talked about but efficacious and sufficient grace; and the names of Jansenists and Molinists, which were given to the two parties, became as famous as those of Guelphs and Ghibelines had formerly been in Italy.

Urban the Eighth, warned by the experience of the last century, that all religious discussions were injurious to the papacy, wished to arrest them by issuing a brief, which prohibited the Augustinus from being read; but this prohibition only increased the general curiosity, and the book spread with surprising rapidity.

In the height of the dispute the cardinal Richelieu died, and the abbot of St. Cyran, set at liberty, was enabled to place himself at the head of the establishment of Port Royal, and give a fresh movement to the theological war.

The pope, finding his efforts to arrest these quarrels powerless, determined not to trouble himself about them any longer, and to bestow all his care on the more serious war which had broken out between the Holy See and Duke Odoardo Farnese. He proceeded as the pontiffs were accustomed to do; he excommunicated the duke of Parma, lanced the thunders of the Vatican against him, declared him to be deprived of all rights in his states, and freed his subjects from the oaths they had taken to him as their lawful sovereign. As bulls of anathema had fallen into great discredit, especially since his holiness had fulminated them against the Spanish Catholics who chewed tobacco, who used it as snuff, or who smoked it in the churches; and as Urban was himself the very person to recognise their inefficacy in things of this world, he was careful to strengthen his excommunication by a good army which started for Parma. In vain did the ambassadors of foreign powers wish to interfere, and reconcile the two enemies; the sovereign pontiff refused to listen to any proposal for peace, and replied, "that there was no possible pacification between a lord and his vassal; that he was desirous of punishing the duke; that he had money, courage, and troops, and that moreover God and the world would be with him."

Urban was however in error, for the Italian princes, jealous of the aggrandisement of the Roman court, were unwilling to allow the pontiff to seize on the duchy of Parma, as he had done on the provinces of Urbino and Ferrara. The dukes of Este, the princes of the family of the Medici, and the Venetians formed a league, and encamped in the territory of Modena, to prevent the passage of the troops of the pope. Odoardo Farnese, finding that Italy had declared in his favour, became bolder, and resolved to attempt a bold stroke which should immediately terminate the war. At the head of only three thousand horse, without artillery and without infantry, he turned the flank of the army of the pontiff, which had gone into winter quarters in the environs of Ferrara; he made an irruption into the states of the church, without being arrested either by the fort Urban, on which his holiness counted largely, or by the militia of the Holy See, which, instead of fighting, shut itself up in Bologna; and he arrived at the gates of Rome, having received on his way the submission of the cities of Imola, Faenza, Lodi, Castiglione de Lago, and of Citia del Pieve. But there, whether he was alarmed by his own boldness, or whether he was under the control of religious considerations, instead of attacking the holy city, which was destitute of troops, and which he could certainly have carried at the first assault, he entered into negotiations.

The wary pontiff skilfully protracted the conferences, gained time, recruited fresh troops, and when he was in a condition to take the field, he broke off the conferences, forced the duke to retreat, and ordered the cardinal Antonio to resume the offensive at the head of a new army of thirty thousand infantry and six thousand cavalry. He was at first successful. His troops drove the Venetians and the dukes of Ferrara and Modena before them, penetrated into the territory of Modena, and even as far as Polesina and the duchy of Rovigo. None of the allies of the duke of Parma submitted however to the Holy See; all continued to resist it quietly, and appeared to have no other end but to protract the war, until a financial crisis should give them the victory without fighting.

The pope, who knew perfectly well that his treasury was empty, his resources exhausted, and his credit gone, saw with rage the time approaching in which his troops would disband for want of pay, and would leave him at the mercy of his enemies, if they did not even reinforce their ranks. He wrote to his generals to bring on a decisive battle; he sent courier after courier to excite them to activity, and to reproach their indolence. All this great impatience, however, only ended in inducing the leaders of the papal army to commit imprudences; for they, in obedience to the orders of the pope, engaged in several skirmishes in very dangerous places, and were defeated by the Venetians. In one of them, the cardinal Antonio himself almost fell into the power of his enemies, and was only saved by the fleetness of his horse.

At last the critical moment arrived, that of paying the troops. His holiness not having wherewith to satisfy the exigencies of his position, was obliged to address himself to the ambassadors of the regent of France, and to entreat them to negotiate a peace with the other states of Italy. The latter, in their turn, were unwilling to listen to any proposal, until the pope had relieved the duke of Parma from the sentences of excommunication lanced against him, and would restore to him the city of Castro, which he was compelled to do. Urban was so mortified at being reduced to such an extremity, that from the moment of signing the treaty, he sank into a state of feebleness. His health languished, all his moral energy seemed to abandon him; he was heard to do nothing but sigh and groan, asking for vengeance from heaven on the impious princes who had constrained him to make peace, and on the 20th of July, 1644, he breathed his last, blaspheming the name of God, and confounding in the same curses the doge of Venice, the dukes of Parma, Modena, and Tuscany, the French and Spaniards, protestants and Catholics.

INNOCENT, THE TENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1644.]

Election of Innocent the Tenth—Character of the pontiff—His sister-in-law Olympia governs the church—The pope endeavours to make the Barberini disgorge—They take refuge in France under the protection of Mazarin—Marriage of the nephew of his holiness with the young Olympia Aldobrandina, the richest heiress in Rome—Debauchery and incest of the pope with the two Olympias—Scandalous quarrels between these two women—Re-establishment of the Barberini—War of Italy between France and Spain—Revolution at Naples—History of Masaniello the Fisherman—The duke of Guise makes an attempt to seize on the crown of Naples—Innocent the Tenth refuses to recognise John the Fourth as king of Portugal—He protests against the peace of Westphalia—Tyranny of Charles the First, king of England—Punishment of Charles the First—The pope adopts Camillo Astalli, who becomes his minion as the cardinal nephew—Division in the papal family—The Molinists and the Jansenists—Port Royal and its solitaires—The five propositions—Fanaticism of Vincent de Paul—He persecutes the Jansenists with fury—Innocent refuses to take part in the theological quarrels about grace—Charles Stuart, the son of Charles the First, endeavours to mount the throne by aid of the civil wars—He is conquered by Cromwell—The English republic—Cromwell seizes on the sovereign power, and reigns by the title of protector—Death of Innocent the Tenth.

THE mortal remains of Clement the Eighth were scarcely buried, when the Barberini introduced troops into Rome, in order to control the new elections, and to be able to elevate to the pontificate the cardinal Sachetti, their creature; but they soon saw that their candidate, rejected by the factions of France, Germany, Spain, and Italy, had no chance of success; they then united with the Medici, to intrigue for the cardinal Firenzola, a monk of the order of St. Dominic. They were again compelled to abandon their candidate, the French party actively opposing their proceeding to this exaltation, because Firenzola was the avowed enemy of Cardinal Mazarin, who had succeeded Richelieu in the post of minister of the king. The Barberini and the Medici joined the Spaniards out of spite, and gave the majority to the cardinal Pamfili, who was declared sovereign pontiff by the name of Innocent the Tenth.

The holy father was a Roman by birth, and of an old family. He had been successively advocate, consistorial, auditor of the rota, nuncio to Naples, datary in the legations of France and Spain, and finally cardinal. His character was similar to that of most priests, dissimulative, vindictive, cruel, audacious in success, timid in danger, and implacable in its vengeance; his face was hideous and deformed; his mind worthy of his exterior.

On the advent of Innocent the Tenth to the Holy See, the policy of the court of Rome was singularly modified, not from the action of the pope, but from the new direction impressed on affairs by his sister-in-law, the widow Dona Olympia Maldachini de Viterba, who carried on incestuous intercourse with him, and so publicly, that she was known by the name of the popess. By the wishes of this shameless courtesan, the Medici, and the cardinals of the Spanish faction, were placed in possession of all the most important offices of the church, which took from the French party the preponderance they had enjoyed during the former reign.

As for the Barberini, they were less reserved with them; under pretext of making them render an account of their financial administration during the war of Castro, they accused them of concussion, of encroachments on justice, and of a robbery of the public money. These, finding that they desired their wealth, sought to save it by placing themselves under the protection of France; and as the cardinal Mazarin was discontented with the court of Rome, he informed his holiness through the ambassador, that the regent took the Barberini under her safeguard, and attached them to her crown. In his turn, the pope declared that he would forcibly assist justice, and that he would not abandon his rights, even though the armies of the most Christian king were beneath the walls of Rome. Antonio Barberini, who, as the richest of the family, was the most exposed, fled immediately, and retired into France, where he was joined some time afterwards by Francisco, his brother, and Thadeo, his nephew.

Whilst, on the one hand, the ungrateful pontiff was pursuing the nephews of Urban, to whom he owed his elevation to the chair of St. Peter, on the other, in contempt of the treaties concluded by his predecessors, he recommenced the war against the duke of Parma, sacked the city of Castro, and ordered his generals to level the walls to the earth, and on the smoking ruins of this magnificent city he caused a column to be erected, with this barbarous inscription, "Here was Castro."

After having accomplished the ruin of the Barberini, the new pope was engaged in the elevation of his own family. Already had his incestuous mistress Dona Olympia attained so high a degree of power, that ambassadors, who came to Rome, commenced by visiting her, before they presented themselves at the Vatican. Cardinals had her portrait suspended in their apartments by the side of that of Innocent, as a testimonial of their deference for the favourite; and foreign courts openly bought her protection by presents or pensions. Those soliciting preferment sought equally to interest her in their favour by the same means, so that from all sides riches flowed with such an abundance into her coffers, that she was enabled in a short time to acquire palaces and immense estates. The holy father then thought of the establishment of the children of his dear Olympia. He married the eldest of her daughters to a Ludovico, and the second to a Gustiniani. As for his bastard Don Camillo, a young man of notorious incapacity, who had been judged capable at the most of being made a cardinal, the opportunity of a brilliant marriage offering to him, he relieved him from his vows, and made him espouse Dona Olympia Aldobrandina, the richest widow in Rome, young, beautiful, full of grace and spirit, but who, at the same time, joined to these brilliant qualities an insatiable thirst for ruling.

As soon as she was installed in the pontifical palace, the young Dona Olympia sought to supplant her mother-in-law, by disputing the price of incest with her. Frightful quarrels of jealousy broke out between these two women, and were carried so far, that in order to arrest the scandal, his holiness was compelled to separate himself momentarily from his new mistress. The disgrace, however, of the young Olympia lasted but a short time; the pope himself recalled her to the Vatican, and appeared to grant her a marked preference over his sister-in-law. The intestine dissensions then became more violent than ever, and in consequence of reproaches which these two rivals addressed to each other in the midst of the Corso, the whole city was apprised of the outrageous orgies of Innocent the Tenth, and of the mysteries of the gardens of the palace of the Lateran.

This false position of the holy father naturally influenced his character; he became versatile, capricious, obstinate, insupportable to himself and others; placed between two mistresses equally ambitious, equally exacting, he was constrained to obey their orders; and as both took pleasure in contradicting each other, it reached so far, that at night his holiness prohibited what he had authorised in the morning. Thus, after having pursued the Barberini with extreme violence at the instigation of his sister-in-law, yielding to the solicitations of his niece, he suddenly changed his conduct towards them, stopped the proceedings commenced against the cardinal Antonio, recalled all the members of that family to Rome, reinstated them in their wealth and dignities, and even gave one of his nieces in marriage to Maffeo Barberino, prince of Palestrina. It is true that the success of the French in Italy had induced the holy father to take this favourable determination towards the proteges of Cardinal Mazarin.

Another event, until that time unexampled in the annals of Italy, had shown Innocent that it was surer for him to re-attach himself to France, than to follow the Spanish power in its fall. This event was the memorable revolution of Naples directed by Masaniello, a common fisherman of the Lagunes.

The viceroy, Ponce de Leon, duke of Arcos, who commanded for Philip the Fourth, was driven from his castle by a band of malcontents, and obliged to save himself in the castle Neuf, one of the principal fortresses of the city. In vain did he endeavour to appease the revolt, by promising to the insurgents the suppression of all imposts; Masaniello, who was the leader of the revolt, was unwilling to listen to any plan of arrangement, until the duke of Arcos had handed to him the original of the privileges granted by Charles the Fifth to the city of Naples. The young fisherman then went to the viceroy at the head of a magnificent cavalcade, and clothed in a garment of brocade, to negotiate a treaty, to which he agreed as the leader of the people, correcting and modifying the articles without any one daring to contradict him. Masaniello exacted, that there should be in future an absolute equality in political rights for all citizens; he suppressed taxes and imposts; he exacted that a general amnesty should be proclaimed for all those who had taken part in the revolt, and stipulated that the Neapolitans should remain armed, until the ratification of the treaty by his majesty Philip the Fourth.

When all these conventions had been signed by the duke of Arcos, the fisherman convened the people on the great square of Naples, and announced his resolution to abdicate the temporary royalty with which he had been invested, in order to return to his cabin; fifty thousand voices were then raised to beseech him to preserve the sovereign authority until the treaty was entirely executed. Ponce de Leon feigned to share the sentiments of the crowd, besought the fisherman of the Lagunes to retain the command of the city, and invited him to a sumptuous banquet, which he gave in his palace in token of rejoicing. On leaving this repast, the unfortunate Masaniello felt himself attacked by a strange fever, which manifested itself in a fit of delirium and of real madness; the traitorous Spaniard, not daring to rid himself openly of his enemy, had administered poison to him. And as if this first crime had not been enough, the infamous duke sent four gentlemen to the cabin of Masaniello, during the night, to murder him. One of these assassins cut off his head, took it by the hair, and bore it still bleeding to the vice king, who caused it to be thrown into the ditches of the city.

In the morning, the news of the death of the fisherman spread through Naples and excited a general rising; twenty-four thousand citizens pressed to the public square demanding vengeance; the dead body was carried in triumph through all the streets of the city, the head having been reattached to the trunk; it was then covered with a royal mantle, and the brow encircled by a crown of laurels; all men and women, came in crowds to touch the body of the martyr with their rosaries, and this manifestation was so universal, that the duke of Arcos could not avoid sending his pages, and all his officers, to the funeral of the victim.

This first moment of exasperation over, things resumed their usual course; the viceroy, freed from the leader of the insurrection, thought only of punishing the rebels, and not of fulfilling his promises. All danger was not, however, over; the noise of this revolution had spread rapidly to Rome, and the pontiff seeing the possibility of wresting the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily from Spain, by favouring the troubles, determined the young duke of Guise, who was then with him, to throw himself into Naples, in order to put himself at the head of the revolt. The young prince, seduced by the glitter of a crown, obeyed the holy father, embarked on a mere felucca, passed rashly through the midst of the naval armament of Don Juan, disembarked on the Lagunes, and entered the city, escorted by the old friends of the unfortunate Masaniello. The Spaniards were again driven from Naples and obliged to take refuge in their fortresses or vessels; but the triumph of the duke of Guise was of short duration. Some adventures of gallantry greatly indisposed several nobles towards him, and one day, when he had sallied forth at the head of some troops to facilitate the entrance of a convoy, the latter surrendered the city to the viceroy. His efforts to retake it were useless, and ended with his falling into the power of the Spaniards. The great Condé, who was then serving in the ranks of the enemies of France, asked and obtained the liberty of Henry of Guise, on condition that he would foment divisions in the kingdom, and would take the side of the house of Austria. The duke promised all that was required of him; but the bad treatment he had experienced at Madrid, during his captivity, had left his heart too much resentments, not to think of keeping the oaths he had taken to recover his liberty. Instead of returning to France, he went again into Italy, to solicit from Innocent the Tenth an authority for his divorce from the countess of Bossu, his wife, and to enable him to marry Mademoiselle de Pons, one of his mistresses, and also to obtain the aid which would enable him to strike another blow at Naples.

Unfortunately for the young duke, other events of great importance engaged all the attention of the pontiff, and prevented him from thinking of his affairs. John the Fourth, duke of Braganza, had seized on the throne of Portugal, and had proclaimed the independence of that kingdom of the crown of Spain, by favour of a revolution which was accomplished in Europe, in all the colonies, in Madeira and the Azores, in Tangiers and Carache, in the kingdoms of Congo and Angola, in Ethiopia, Guinea, and India, and even in the opulent city of Macao, situated on the borders of China. All the powers of Europe had recognised the new sovereign, except the princes of the house of Austria and the king of Spain.

Notwithstanding this unanimous agreement of the Portuguese to break the odious yoke of Philip the Fourth, and the enthusiasm which had hailed his advent to the crown, John the Fourth, who knew the superstitious character of his nation, and feared a change in its ideas, so long as the court of Rome had not ratified his election, employed all his efforts to bring the pope into his interests, and to induce him to recognise him officially as king of Portugal. Thus, after the example of Louis the Thirteenth, he had placed his states under the protection of the Virgin; he had distributed large alms to churches and convents; and several episcopal sees, having become vacant, he had pushed his deference for the pope so far as to refuse to fill them, until he had received authority from him.

Supposing that such conduct had rendered the pope favourable to him, he sent to Rome, with the consent of the ecclesiastics of his kingdom, the prior of Sodefeyta, named Nicholas de Montegro, to solicit bulls of nomination for the prelates who were to fill the vacant benefices. Montegro went to the Vatican on the day of a consistory, and with a noble boldness presented the request of his master, pleaded the cause of the revolution of Portugal, and condemned in energetic terms the cruelties which the kings of Spain had exercised in that country since the usurpation of the execrable Philip the Second. The count of Sirvola, the Spanish ambassador, who was present at the reception of the prior of Sodefeyta, dared not enter into a public discussion with this skilful orator, and retired, covered with shame and confusion; but some days afterwards, he took his revenge. Banditti whom he had taken into his pay, attacked the carriage of Montegro, in open day, killed six of his people, and fired several pistols at him, which fortunately only grazed his garments. Though Innocent knew very well, that the count of Sirvola had commanded this expedition, he dared not act with severity against the culprit, and contented himself with sending him from Rome. His holiness refused all kind of reparation to the prior of Sodefeyta, and was unwilling to do any thing about the bishoprics of Portugal, which so much discontented him, that he left Rome at once and returned to Portugal.

In Germany, the political horizon was also darkening for the court of Rome and the house of Austria. The war which had been until this time, carried on between the Catholics and protestants, with alternate reverses and success, threatened to become more terrible than under Gustavus Adolphus. The Lutheran armies were commanded by Duke Bernard of Saxe Weimar, one of the great captains of the day, a calm, intrepid man, joining the courage of the soldier to the moderation of the philosopher. Such a leader was too formidable for the papal cause, and he died of poison.—Bannier, who succeeded him in the command, met the same fate. Torstenson, the Swedish general, was more fortunate than his predecessors, he escaped the dagger and poison.

continued the war, and made himself master of Franconia, Bohemia, and Prague, whilst Condé, having returned to the service of France, gained the victories of Rocroy and Nordlingen, over the combined Austrian and Spanish armies. All these reverses alarmed Ferdinand the Third, and determined him to sign the peace of Westphalia, which put an end to the thirty years' war, and proclaimed liberty of conscience through the whole extent of the empire. By this convention Sweden acquired Pomerania, and France was assured in the possession of Alsace, several bishoprics, the city of Brisach, and the right to garrison Philipsburg. The elector of Brandenburg united to his states the duchy of Magdeburg and the city of Minden; the elector Palatine recovered a part of his former domains, and obtained an eighth electoral vote, in recompense for that of which he had been deprived, and which was preserved to the duke of Bavaria; other princes also acquired an increase of territory to the detriment of the emperor.

Innocent the Tenth, who perceived that the influence of the Holy See was entirely lost in Germany, wished to protest against the treaty of Westphalia, and fulminated the following bull:—"By virtue of our infallible knowledge and the plenitude of our power, we declare that the treaties of Westphalia are prejudicial to the Catholic religion, to divine worship, to the safety of souls, to the apostolic see, to the inferior churches, to the ecclesiastical order and state, as well as to the clergy, its immunities, property, privileges, and authorities; we consequently revoke them perpetually, we declare them to be null, vain, iniquitous, unjust, condemned, reprobated, without force and effect, and we affirm that no king or prince who has signed them, is bound to observe them, although he has engaged to do so by the most solemn oaths.

"Given at Rome, at St. Maria Majora, under the seal of the fisherman, on the 26th day of November, in the year 1648, and of our pontificate the fifth."

This singular protest produced no effect on Ferdinand the Third, Christiern the Second, nor Louis the Fourteenth; the attention of these sovereigns, as well as that of all the powers of Europe, was besides entirely absorbed by the gravity of the events which the despotism of Charles the First, and the religious fanaticism of his wife, Henrietta Maria of France, had given rise to in England.

The struggle commenced between the king and people, on the subject of subsidies; the parliament refused to vote them, and for twelve years Charles governed absolutely, and without a parliament. Necessity then compelled him again to call one together, and the struggle was renewed with increased bitterness, and after some years of bloody contests and ruthless massacres, ended in the death of Charles, who was beheaded by order of the parliament, on the 30th of January, 1649.—On that day a scaffold was erected in the street, which runs along side of Whitehall, of the same height with the windows of the first story. At half-past two o'clock, Charles the First, king of Great Britain, dressed in black, with a black cap surmounted by a plume of feathers of the same colour, and wearing around his neck the collar of St. George, advanced to the foot of the block, where two executioners in masks awaited him. He then despoiled himself of his garments, covered his shoulders with his cloak, and kneeled to receive the fatal blow. One of the executioners raised his axe, and at a blow cut off his head; justice was accomplished. It is maintained that the executioner had been that day replaced in his functions by an English lord, the Earl Stair, who had thus taken vengeance for a former outrage committed to his family, in the person of his aunt, who had been carried off by the orders of Charles Stuart, when she was a young girl, and had been violated by that monarch.

The death of the king of England deprived the holy father of the hope of making Catholicism triumph in the British isles, and compelled him to seek for another aliment for the activity of his mind. He then took part in the intrigues of the palace, and by turns elevated to power, or hurled from it, the creatures of his sister-in-law, or of Dona Olympia, his niece, as either succeeded over her rival, and merited the preferences of the old cynic by lascivious caresses, or infamous compliances.

Thus, he gave the post of datary of the Roman church to a lover of the young Olympia, to recompense her for having given him, in the gardens of the palace of the Lateran, a magnificent spectacle of females, entirely naked, abandoning themselves to the games of the courtezans of Lesbos; he then disgraced the favourite, to give his post to Mascambruno, a lover of his sister-in-law, who had regained her empire over him, by even surpassing the irregularities and shameful orgies of his niece. Finally, an event, apparently very indifferent, and which had been intended to increase the influence of Dona Olympia, his sister-in-law, became the cause of her disgrace, and the triumph of her rival.

Innocent the Tenth had not had a cardinal nephew since the marriage of Don Camillo Pamfili, and did not think of replacing him. Dona Olympia, who was desirous of creating new means of ruling his mind, persuaded him that it was necessary for him to adopt one of his relatives to occupy the post of Don Camillo Pamfili, and she presented to him a young man of extraordinary beauty, Camillo Astalli, whom she had made her lover in advance.

At the sight of this handsome young man, Innocent the Tenth felt strange sensations in his heart; he received Astalli with extraordinary kindness, and declared that he consented to bestow the dignity of cardinal nephew on him. His holiness pushed his attentions towards his relative so far as to instal him, that same night, in a chamber of the Vatican adjoining his private apartments. The next day, Camillo Astalli had become the minion of the pope, and the elevation of the new favourite was celebrated by public festivals and salves of artillery. From that day, the cardinal nephew was invested with the confidence of the sovereign pontiff, and directed, at his pleasure, all the affairs of the church. This was not what Dona Olympia had wished; she had contributed to the elevation of Camillo Astalli to obtain an ally against the young Olympia, and not to create a rival still more dangerous than her daughter-in-law, and it turned out that she had given a minion to her brother-in-law, and a lover to the young Olympia. She was then occupied in overthrowing the cardinal Astalli from power before he was entirely confirmed in it, and essayed to represent to the pontiff the fatal consequences into which his deplorable passion for this young man would infallibly draw him.

Instead of listening, with his usual indulgence, to the reproaches of his old mistress, Innocent replied to her with sharpness; she replied in the same tone, and a most disgraceful quarrel ensued. She threatened the pope to unveil to Christendom his turpitudes and his infamies, his double incest with her and her daughter-in-law, his amours with the handsome cardinal Astalli, his shameful orgies and execrable debaucheries. His holiness, who recoiled before no scandal, saw no other means of restoring tranquillity to his palace but to expel his sister-in-law, which he did, without at all disturbing himself about her threats.

Innocent the Tenth profited by this period of tranquillity, to give all his attention to the disputes of the Molinists and Jansenists, which were then disturbing the whole Gallican church. After the death of Richelieu, the personal enemy of the abbot of St. Cyran, the latter had been restored to liberty, and had returned to his friends of Port Royal, whose number had increased considerably. The celebrated Lemaistre de Sacy, with four of his brothers, all the Arnaud family, and many others, ecclesiastics, physicians, savants, merchants, tradesmen, had installed themselves there, because they were bound by no vow to live in the community, except from confraternity of sentiment. All followed, according to their taste, religious practices, or study, or the labours of the field, or some mechanical art; the greatest number, however, devoted themselves to literary occupations; they commenced translating the Holy Scriptures, the fathers of the church, the books of Latin prayers; and the new sectaries of Jansenius knew how to avoid skilfully, in their learned works, the superannuated forms of ancient literature, and to express themselves with an elegant clearness.

From their bosom rose men of eminent knowledge, who exercised a great influence over society, and gave new perfection to language and the communication of thought. The abbot of St. Cyran had not the happiness to contemplate in its splendour, the school he had founded. But his disciples sallied forth, like young eagles, from beneath his wings; heirs of his virtue and his piety, they transmitted to others what they had received from him, and courageously continued his work. Such was the nucleus of the Jansenist party in France, and such were the adversaries whom the Molinists, or rather the Jesuits, wished to exterminate.

The disciples of Ignatius Loyola thought that it was urgent for them to have a precise and absolute condemnation pronounced by the Holy See, and the Jesuit Cornet, the syndic of the faculty of theology in Paris, summed up the fundamental doctrines of Jansenius in the following propositions, which he addressed to the sovereign pontiff: "1. There are precepts which the justest man even cannot observe, unless he possesses the grace necessary for that purpose. 2. In a state of decayed nature, one never resists inward grace. 3. To merit and to demerit it is not necessary that a man should have a liberty which excludes necessity, but only a liberty exempt from restraint. 4. Semi-Pelagians admit the necessity of prevailing grace for each particular act, but such, however, that it depends on the will of man to resist, or to follow it. 5. It is a semi-Pelagian doctrine to say that Jesus Christ is dead, and that he has shed his blood for all men."

These propositions were denounced at Rome in a letter written by Habert, become bishop of Valtes, and which Father Vincent de Paul, an insane Molinist and semi-Pelagian, succeeded by force of threats and intrigues in having signed by eighty-five French prelates.

At the solicitation of the Jesuits, the pope appointed a commission, composed of the cardinals Roma, Spada, Ginetti, Ciceterni, Chigi, Pamfili, and thirteen theological counsellors, to give their opinion on these important propositions. From the very first, there were differences in the commission; four of its members, two Dominicans, a Minor Brother, Lucca Wadding, and the general of the Augustines, decided that it was imprudent to condemn it. The majority, however, was of a contrary opinion; they referred it to the holy father for his decision; but the latter, who pushed aside every thing that could trouble his quiet, and who besides did not love dissertations on theological questions, formally refused to pronounce either for one or the other. "When he placed himself on the edge of this ditch," says Pallavicini, "and measured with his eyes the greatness of the space to cross, he stopped, and they could not make him go forward."

The Molinists of France then endeavoured to have the propositions condemned by the faculty of theology. Vincent de Paul, one of the most violent of his party, was very bitter against the partizans of the doctrines of the bishop of Ypres, and used his influence with the queen to remove from civil charges and benefices, all who were infected with the poison of the doctrines of Jansenius, and to have interdicted, as enemies of religion and the state, the professors and preachers who were suspected of Jansenism. He could not, however, prevent twenty bishops and archbishops from undertaking the defence of the fraternity of Port Royal, and from opposing the condemnation of the doctrines they professed. Innocent finally wished to interpose his authority in the matter, to stop the uproar; but he encountered so active an opposition on both sides, that he was compelled to renounce it from regard to his dignity as sovereign pontiff. He had it, besides, more at heart to put an end to the very serious dissensions in his own family, arising from the jealousy which Camillo Pamfili had conceived of the cardinal Don Camillo Astalli. The holy father, placed in the alternative of losing his mistress or his minion to restore tranquillity to the Vatican, determined to separate from his nephew Pamfili and the young Olympia.

The sister-in-law of Innocent availed herself of this circumstance to return to the palace; she gradually recovered the empire she had exercised over his mind, she became the purveyor to his pleasures, and among others, presented to him a young man named Azzolino, whom she destined to supplant the cardinal Astalli, in the good graces of his holiness, as he persisted in wishing to preserve the honours and profits of his place for himself alone, and refused to surrender the least part to her. Azzolino, in fact, reached, notwithstanding the opposition of his rival, the important post of secretary of the briefs, and acquired such an ascendancy over the pope, that the cardinal nephew, foreseeing his approaching discharge, sought to assure himself of aid against Innocent the Tenth himself, by betraying to the Florentines and Spaniards the secrets of the policy of the court of Rome. But the treason having been discovered, and the proofs placed before the eyes of the pope, Astalli was stripped of the purple, driven from the Vatican, and exiled to Sambucco, in the marquisate of his brother. The name and arms of Pamfili were taken from him, as well as his post and benefices, and Olympia made him restore the sum of six thousand crowns of gold, which he had carried off in his baggage when quitting the palace.

After the fall of this favourite, the sister-in-law of the pontiff became, as during the first years of his reign, the dispensress of all the wealth and all the revenues of the church; Innocent was so entirely occupied with his passion for the handsome Azzolino, that he was unwilling to pay attention any longer to temporal or spiritual affairs. If ambassadors addressed any remarks to him on the disorders in his finances, he replied, "Speak to my dear Olympia." If the Jesuits wished to urge him to condemn the Jansenists, he replied to them, "That he was unwilling to annoy himself with such absurd things, that he desired to live in peace; that they must speak to Cardinal Chigi, the minister." The disciples of Ignatius Loyola returned, however, so often to the charge, that, to rid himself of their importunities, Innocent published a bull against the five propositions attributed to Jansenius, as heretical, blasphemous, and loaded with improprieties, and he declared that he had nothing more at heart than to guide the ship of the church into a calm sea, that it might reach a port of safety. This decision was immediately sent to France, with briefs for the king and the bishops; then the cardinal Mazarin, at the instigation of Father Vincent de Paul, published an edict which enjoined on all the prelates of the kingdom to accept the bull which condemned the five propositions of Jansenius. No opposition was shown to this decree; the followers of the bishop of Ypres themselves adhered to the censures of the Holy See; they only declared that the condemned propositions were not found in the writings of Jansenius, and that they were the invention of the Jesuit Cornet, and of the head of the missions, Vincent de Paul, which rendered that polemic more violent than ever.

In England the religious and political wars continued with the same fury, and caused rivers of blood to flow. The oldest son of Charles the First, from his retreat at the Hague, sent Jesuits into Ireland and Scotland to excite these two kingdoms against the English; he had also established communications with several influential peers, who were to propose his installation on the throne when parliament assembled. But Oliver Cromwell, informed of what was about to take place, was beforehand with them, and sent to the house of commons a decree, declaring that the house of peers should be abolished as useless and dangerous. Freed from this new anxiety, he claimed, and obtained from parliament, authority to go into Ireland at the head of a numerous and well disciplined army, to combat the papists and royalists; he traversed the country like a torrent, ravaging every thing on his way with brutal ferocity, putting the garrisons of places to the sword, burning towns, villages, farmhouses, massacring, indiscriminately, men, women, and children, and leaving behind him but ruins, heaps of ashes, and dead bodies. Almost all the cities of Ireland, which held for the pretender, hastened to submit to the English general, in order to shun the effects of his anger; and every thing presaged that the kingdom was about to be pacified, when an order of parliament interrupted the progress of Cromwell, and compelled him to return to England to protect his own country against an invasion of the Scotch. Before, however, parting, he left the command of the troops with Ireton and Lud, two of his best generals, who finished his work. On his return to London he caused himself to be appointed captain general of the armies of the republic, placed himself at the head of the troops which parliament could spare, and which only amounted to sixteen thousand men, and with this small army advanced boldly against the Scotch troops, which were commanded by Charles Stuart, in person, met them near Dunbar, gave them battle and cut them to pieces.

Cromwell was not content with one victory; he wished to profit by his advantages; he pursued the pretender, drove him from the other side of the Perth, whither he had retired with the wreck of his army, cut off his provisions, and forced him to fight retreating. After several months of reverses, marches and counter marches, Charles Stuart, abandoned by his followers, and pursued on every side, embarked for France, and went to join his mother, Henrietta Maria, who had been received with great distinction by the cardinal Mazarin and the regent, Anne of Austria.

The captain general returned in triumph to London, and caused it to be immediately decreed by parliament, that royalty was abolished in Scotland, and that kingdom should no longer be regarded but as a province of the English republic; he, moreover, demanded an edict of expulsion for all Catholic or episcopal priests, who were the brands of discord. He caused similar resolutions to be passed concerning Ireland, the islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly and the colonies. There was then seen, with astonishment, a vast empire pass from a monarchy to a republic, almost without a shock, and a parliament chosen by the commons, and totally destitute of political experience, without other aid than that of a council of state composed of thirty-eight members, occupied with government, finances, war, marine, levying armies, equipping fleets, passing laws, making treaties, and that without crushing the provinces with imposts, ruining commerce, and oppressing the people. All these facts, prove in an incontestable manner, and better than all reasoning can do, the superiority of democratical over monarchical governments.

But, for the misfortune of England, things could not remain long in the same condition. Oliver Cromwell, the old republican, that terrible adversary of royalty, wanted a dictatorship for himself. Although he had, up to this time, directed in some sort the deliberations of parliament, he discovered that he could never conquer nor corrupt the citizens who formed the national assembly, nor render them accomplices in his attempt upon the public liberties; he determined then to give the preponderance of power to the army. He induced the officers to present to the parliament a petition, asking it to pronounce its own dissolution, and providing that the sitting members should be replaced by new men. Then, as Cromwell had foreseen, parliament was offended at the audacity of the army, and several members proposed to pass a decree declaring those guilty of high treason, who should in future present such petitions. The officers immediately addressed active remonstrances to the members of the house of commons; the latter replied, with bitterness, and soon parliament and the army were engaged in a quarrel.

Finally, when he supposed the moment for striking the great blow had come, Cromwell took with him three hundred soldiers and surrounded the hall in which the assembly met. He entered alone, as if nothing extraordinary had happened, sat down in his usual place, and listened to the debate for some time. When he saw the assembly about to close the discussion, he suddenly rose, spoke, addressed vehement reproaches to the members of parliament on their pretended tyranny, and declared that he was about to put an end to it; he then stamped with his foot and called out in a loud voice. At this signal soldiers precipitated themselves into the hall with drawn swords, and ready to execute the orders of Cromwell. Sir Henry Vane, unintimidated at this sight, rose from his seat, protested in energetic terms against this odious action, and branded Cromwell with the names of despot and tyrant.

"Sir Henry," exclaimed he, in a burst of passion, "be careful lest heaven rid me of you at once! It is you," he said, addressing the deputies, "it is you who have driven me to this extreme measure. I implored the Lord night and day. I besought him to wrest my life from me rather than constrain me to this violence; but he ordered me to drive you hence, as he before drove the traffickers from the temple." Then pointing to the speaker's mace, which was the emblem of the inviolable power of parliament, he added, "What is this bauble doing here?"—As soon as it was carried off, he drove out all the deputies before him, emptied the chamber, and having given an order to shut the doors, he took the keys and returned to preside over the session of the council at Whitehall.

Notwithstanding his success, the captain general was not without uneasiness as to the consequences of his state blow; he wished then, in order to prevent any rising among the people, to give a new parliament to the English, and determined that the sovereign power should be divided among a hundred and thirty-nine members, of whom he reserved the nomination to himself. He chose them from among the most ultra and ignorant fanatics, in order that these incapable men might not think of disputing the exercise of the supreme authority with him, or that their exaggerated doctrines might cause their dismissal to be desired, and consequently the final dissolution of parliament be rendered more easy.

The conduct of these new deputies fully justified the hopes of Cromwell; they surpassed every thing in absurdity and fanaticism. The majority were antinomians, and affiliated with a sect which declared themselves to be enemies of the laws, and pretended to infallibility through communication with the Holy Spirit, which they said they had received like the apostles. They commenced by choosing eight members of their tribe who were especially charged "to seek the Lord in prayer," whilst the others were employed in debates about the suppression of the Presbyterian ministers, the universities, and the courts of justice. They gravely decided that all these institutions should be replaced by the laws of Moses; they declared that all Presbyterians and Catholics were carnal beings, only occupied with trade and industry, and that they must refuse even to make a covenant with them; finally, they pushed their nonsense so far as to ask of God by vote, that the Man of Sin should disappear from the surface of the earth, and that a new generation, born of prayer and meditation, should people the world.

The people soon exclaimed against these absurd legislators, and demanded their suppression. Cromwell hastened to grant it, and the parliament was dissolved. Nothing now opposing the ambitious projects of the captain general, he was saluted as Protector of the Republic by the army; the lord mayor and aldermen of London, who were already sold to him, ratified the nomination, and came to salute him in this capacity at the palace of Whitehall, where he had already taken up his residence.

The Jesuits, who had reappeared in Ireland, sought to avail themselves of this event to renew their intercourse with the Catholics of Great Britain, and to try a movement in favour of Charles Stuart; but they were completely foiled, and obliged to re-embark in haste to shun the vengeance of the protector. They were more fortunate in an enterprise of another kind, whose success excited great joy among the whole order. They had brought about, by their intrigues, the conversion of the daughter of the great Gustavus Adolphus, the celebrated Christina, queen of Sweden, who had abdicated her crown, and was preparing to go to Rome to receive imposition of the hands of the pope.

Innocent the Tenth was then lying on a bed of sickness, tormented by the gout, and entirely exhausted by his excesses of lust. In addition to his physical sufferings, which were intolerable, he was under the empire of imaginary fear, and dreaded so much lest his minion should endeavour to poison him, that he feared to take any nourishment unless it had been prepared in the presence of his sister-in-law; he even exacted that she should not leave his room for a moment, and constantly held one of her hands clasped in his.

He finally expired on the 5th of January, 1655, after a sickness of several months. His body remained three whole days abandoned to the mercy of the domestics of the palace, without any one taking the pains to bury it, according to the usages of the court of Rome. Dona Olympia herself refused to contribute to the funeral expenses, and permitted an old canon to bury it at his own expense.

ALEXANDER THE SEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1655.]

Intrigues in the conclave—Election of Alexander the Seventh—Character of the new pontiff—Debaucheries of the pope and his nephews—Journeys of Queen Christina to Italy and France—St. Vincent de Paul persecutes the Jansenists—Appearance of the Provincial Letters of Pascal—The Alumbrados and the Quietists—History of George Fox, the founder of Quakerism—Atheism of the pope—He refuses to take part in a war against the Turks—Satire upon his covetousness and that of his family—He endeavours to rekindle war in Europe, in order to raise up the power of the Holy See—Quarrels between the courts of Rome and Versailles—Louis the Fourteenth threatens to come and burn the pope in the Vatican—His holiness sends relics painted in cartoons to the great king—Restoration in England—Charles the Second mounts the throne of Great Britain—The Jesuits kindle an immense fire in London, in order to destroy the Presbyterians—The court of Rome congratulates Charles the Second on the protection he grants to Catholicism—Massacre of the Vaudois in Italy—Death of Alexander.

As soon as the obsequies of the old pope Innocent the Tenth were over, the cardinals hastened to assemble in conclave to proceed to a new election, and the struggle was as usual among the Imperial, Italian, French, and Spanish parties.

The celebrated cardinal de Retz, who was then at Rome, and a party to the conclave, has transmitted to us minutely the long intrigues in which he took an active part, and which ended in elevating to the Holy See the cardinal Fabio Chigi, who took the name of Alexander the Seventh.

The new pope was born at Sienna, and was the descendent of a noble family. Through the influence of the marquis of Pallavicini, he had been rapidly elevated at the court of Rome, and had filled in succession the offices of grand inquisitor at Malta, and nuncio at Munster. It is maintained that in this last city, the legate wished to traffic with his conscience, and become a heretic, in exchange for a rich bishopric, but that his demand had been rejected, and that in revenge he had thrown himself into the most ultra Catholicism.

The cardinal de Retz, in his memoirs, asserts that he was all his life a profound dissembler, and had deceived the sacred college concerning his true character. "His honied tone of voice, and hypocritical countenance, imposed on all the cardinals," says the learned prelate. "When the ballot which made him pope was counted he shed tears; at the adoration, he affected to seat himself on a corner of the altar of St. Peter, and upon the remark of the master of ceremonies, that custom demanded that he should place himself in the middle of it, he did it, but with extreme humility. He received the congratulations of the sacred college with still more modesty; instead of replying to the congratulations, he went to sobbing in so grotesque a manner, that those assisting could not restrain bursts of laughter, and said to him, 'enough, holy father, enough.' Finally, as I approached in my turn to kiss his feet, he threw himself on my neck, and said to me whilst embracing me, 'pity me that I have been made pope, and pardon the marks of weakness I show, from the consideration that I am but a man.'"

During the first months of his pontificate Alexander the Seventh continued his hypocritical life; but when he had consolidated his powers, he acted like his predecessors, cast aside the mask, and showed all his vices in open day.

His first care was to distribute the most important offices of the church among the members of his family, in order to have around him people interested in defending him; he gave to his brother Don Mario the superintendence of the Anona, and the administration of justice in the Borgo; he made his nephew Fabio Chigi, cardinal padrone, with a revenue of a hundred thousand scudi; he chose another of his nephews, named Agostino, to perpetuate the race of the Chigi, and married him to a Borghese, giving him as a dowry the magnificent island of Anicia, the Farnese principality, a palace on the place Colonna, and a considerable revenue on the apostolic treasury; he did not forget one of the members of his family, and there was not even the most remote cousin of his holiness, who did not find himself provided for by his care, with some fat benefice, or very lucrative employment.

Alexander was then occupied with his pleasures, and amply recompensed himself for the constraint he had imposed upon himself before he was pope; instead of passing his days in the church, and his nights in prayer, he embarked in festivities, in hunting parties, and orgies. Instead of dwelling at Rome, the better to superintend the affairs of government, he took up his residence at his magnificent country seat of Castel Gandolfo; and if, by chance, he came to pass a few hours of the day at the Vatican, it was to give an audience to buffoons, or licentious writers, who read their works to him. "I served Alexander the Seventh for forty-two months," said Guicciardini; "I discovered that he thought of nothing but wallowing in the mire of licentiousness, and that he possessed but the name and the vices of the papacy."

Every thing was carried on by the congregation of state, instituted during the pontificate of Urban the Eighth, whose members divided the labour and the power among themselves as follows:—his eminence Rospigliosi managed foreign affairs; the cardinal Carrado de Ferrara those of ecclesiastical immunities; Lugano had the direction of the religious orders, and the Jesuit Pallavicini decided theological questions. His holiness only reserved to himself the free disposal of the apostolic treasury, which he used and abused so greatly, that in order to sustain his profusions, he was obliged to double the imposts.

The preparations alone for the festivities which took place on the arrival of Queen Christina of Sweden at Rome, compelled three levies of subsidies in the same year.

The daughter of the great Gustavus Adolphus, after having abdicated the crown, left Sweden, and crossing through Germany, came to Brussels to abjure Lutheranism in the presence of the archduke Leopold, the counts of Fuensaldagna, Monte Cuculli, and Pimentel. Some months afterwards, she made a public profession of the Catholic religion, in the cathedral of Inspruck, and started for Rome, where she wished to reside.

Few persons believed in the sincerity of the conversion of Christina. The Jesuits themselves avowed that she had yielded, not to religious convictions, but to her love for the extraordinary and the marvellous; they report, in support of their opinion, that she expressed herself in disrespectful terms of the supreme head of the church, and that her conduct in church, at the foot of the altar, was light and indifferent. It is even affirmed, that one day having read in a book a quotation from the work of a Jesuit called "Sincerity of the Conversion of the Queen of Sweden," she underlined this title, and wrote on the margin, "he who has written knows nothing about it, and she who knows all about it has written nothing."

From Inspruck the princess went on a pilgrimage to our Lady of Loretto, and made an offering of her crown and sceptre to the Virgin; she then took the route for the states of the church, and finally arrived in the Campagna of Rome. She made her entrance into the sacred city mounted on a superb courser, and dressed like an Amazon. The sacred college went to meet her; the pontiff received her beneath the porch of St. Peter, at the head of a part of his clergy, and administered the rite of confirmation to her with his own hand, giving her the name of Alexandra, which she added to that of Christina. After having assisted at the festivities which had been prepared in her honour, she took her leave of the pope and went to France, in which she wished to travel before fixing herself definitely at Rome. She did not make a long sojourn, either from secret disappointment at seeing that she produced very little sensation, or from becoming tired of hearing of the constant talking about the quarrels of the Molinists and Jansenists.

It was, in fact, the time in which the disputes about grace had reached their paroxysm of irritation. Not content with having forced the solitaires of Port Royal to submit to the bull of Innocent the Tenth, the hot-headed Vincent de Paul wished to constrain them to recognise that the five propositions which had been anathematised, were to be found in the work of Jansenius; and to reach his end he acted upon Mazarin, and induced the minister to assemble a cabal of thirty-eight bishops, who declared that the Holy See, in censuring the propositions which had been denounced to him by the Molinists, had intended to censure Jansenius himself; and that consequently those who professed his doctrines were excommunicated. The brotherhood of Port Royal replied that they did not follow the doctrines of Jansenius, but those of St. Augustin. They also established that pontifical infallibility could not be admitted in questions of faith, but only in those of right, and then commenced those famous discussions about right and fact.

Vincent de Paul and the Jesuits caused the Sorbonne to censure the two following propositions, which were found in the letters which had been published by Anthony Arnaud, one of the most distinguished members of Port Royal. The first proposition, which was called of right, was as follows:—"The fathers show us a just man in the person of St. Peter, whom grace failed on one occasion, wherefore we cannot say that he never sinned." The second which was called of fact, was thus summed up: "we may doubt whether the five propositions condemned by Innocent as coming from Jansenius, bishop of Ypres, are in the works of that author." The examination of this matter was confided to commissaries, enemies of Anthony Arnaud, who, in defiance of the statutes of the faculty of theology, introduced thirty-two mendicant monks into the assembly, to reinforce the ranks of the Molinists.

Without any regard for the explanations presented by Arnaud, this iniquitous tribunal, which was under the influence of the chancellor Séguier, an infamous man, if there ever was one, the satellite of despotism, the promoter of all measures which were odious and destructive of public liberty, the tool of the Jesuits, the regent, and Mazarin, pronounced a sentence of condemnation. Arnaud wished to protest against this judgment on account of the want of liberty in his defence; but his demands were rejected, and he himself obliged to fly from Port Royal to escape his implacable enemies, notwithstanding the powerful interference of the dukes of de Luynes and de Liancourt, the marchioness of Sablé, the beautiful dutchess de Longueville, the marquis de Coislin, the baron St. Ange, the princess de Guéméné, and the prince de Conti, all partizans of Jansenism.

This defeat did not abate the courage of the solitaires of Port Royal; it only increased their hatred against the Molinists, and consequently caused them to seek the means of crushing their adversaries. Until that time, they had treated of theological questions, already so dry of themselves, in a dogmatical and serious tone, contenting themselves with exhibiting the truth to the learned, and had never thought of placing the public in a position to judge of these propositions, so that the Jesuits, much more numerous and more powerful, had easily triumphed in the eyes of the world, if not by reason at least by clamour.

After the condemnation of Arnaud, it was determined to appeal from the judgment to all France, and to place these arduous questions on dogmas open to every mind. Pascal was charged with the composition of this work by the other solitaires. He soon discovered that he must enliven this sterile matter by a piquant irony, so as to strike to the heart of his enemies, by the doubly powerful arms of ridicule and reason. The work of Pascal appeared under the name of the Provincial Letters, because it was divided into eighteen letters, of which the first ten were addressed to a Jansenist in the provinces, named Perrier, counsellor of the Court of Aids, in the city of Clermont in Auvergne.

These letters had a success which surpassed all the hopes of the Jansenists; the author stigmatised the Jesuits with an ineffaceable ridicule, as well as the doctrines of proximate power, sufficing grace, and withholding of knowledge, which were taught in the works of Molina and St. Thomas Aquinas. He devoted to the execration of men the treatises of the moralists of the Society of Jesus, and principally their dangerous propositions on probabilities, and the art of ruling the intention was to excuse all crimes.

The disciples of Ignatius Loyola, floored by the powerful reasoning of Pascal, called the court of Rome to their assistance, and obtained a new bull, which confirmed that of Innocent the Tenth, pronounced a new sentence of excommunication against the Jansenists, designated them by the name of disturbers of the public peace, children of iniquity, and condemned all the works they had printed, or the manuscripts they had prepared to sustain the doctrine of St. Augustin, as well as those which they might in future compose: the Molinists, and Vincent de Paul, especially, showed great earnestness to have this bull received in France. At their instigation, the principal ecclesiastics of the kingdom assembled in Paris, and declared that the constitution of Alexander should be published with the ordinary forms in all the dioceses, and that severe measures should be adopted to procure its execution.

Independently of this triumph over the Jansenists of France, the Jesuits obtained as brilliant a success in Venice, and by their skilful machinations were reinstated in their colleges by the senate, by a majority of one hundred and sixteen votes against fifty-three.

At Florence their influence was felt in a still more striking manner; all the dignitaries of the order were occupying the most important employments of government, and taking part in the direction of affairs. Thus they had no difficulty in persecuting those Florentines who followed the instructions of a canon named Baron Pandolphus Ricasoli, director of a convent of women, suspected of wishing to renew the heresy of the Alumbrados or Illuminati of Spain, inoffensive sectaries, who professed a doctrine of perfect quietude and impeccability, whom the inquisition had condemned to the stake by thousands half a century before, and whom the cardinal Richelieu and persecuted in France, where they were known by the name of Guérinets, from their leader Guérin, curate of St. Georges de Roye, in the province of Picardy.

By way of beginning, the canon Ricasoli was handed over to the inquisitors and subjected to frightful tortures. The Jesuits spread a story, that this venerable priest, who had edified the city by an exemplary life of fifty years, had associated himself with the widow of a rich merchant, named Fausina Minardi, to form a congregation of young girls; that, aided by Father Seraphin Lupi, a servite monk, and a priest named Jacques Fantoni, he had inculcated among his flock of young nuns a system of libertine quietism, and that he had availed himself of it to initiate Minardi, and her spiritual daughters, in all kinds of voluptuousness. The unfortunate man having died in consequence of the torture, could not give the lie to the calumnies of his enemies; his disciples were driven from the territory of Florence, and the nuns of his convent were condemned to perpetual detention in the dungeons of the inquisition, where they served for the debauches of the monks and their executioners.

The funeral pyres of the holy office in Spain had not been able to annihilate the Alumbrados, and the cruelty of the Jesuits to the canon Ricasoli, was not sufficient to destroy the sect of the Quietists in Italy; from Florence it spread into France and Belgium, where we will soon see it reappear.

It would really appear from the multitude of doctrines to which this age gave birth, as if men were determined to adopt the most ridiculous beliefs, and even to improve upon the extravagancies of the dogmas of the Catholic religion. One of these leaders of sects deserves to occupy an honourable place in history. It is George Fox, a simple artizan of Drayton, a village of Leicestershire, in England, the founder of the Quakers, or Tremblers.

The life of this memorable man, who was called by his followers by the names of "an apostle of the first order," "the glorious instrument in the hand of God," is too singular to be passed over in silence. In his childhood, he was placed with a dealer in wool and cattle, who sent him to keep his flocks in the woods, a kind of occupation which had contributed to exalt an imagination already addicted to contemplation. Abandoned without a guide to his own inclinations, he gave himself up with ardour to reading the Holy Scriptures, and knew the Old and New Testament almost entirely by heart. When he was sixteen years old, his father sent him to Nottingham, as an apprentice to a shoemaker, where he continued his meditations and his reading until he was nineteen years old. He then quitted his master, clothed himself in a dress of skin, and went far into the forests, passing whole days in a crotch of a tree, reading his Bible unceasingly in devout meditations. He arrived at such a degree of asceticism and exaltation, that every night he had ecstasies and hallucinations, during which he thought he heard supernatural voices speaking to him, and ordering him to preach the word of God to men.

He then determined to quit his retreat, and appear in public. He went first to Manchester, and loudly announced that all men had abandoned the ways of God, and had left nothing uncorrupted in doctrine or morals. He preached universal tolerance, condemned war as contrary to the divine laws, and to prevent men from having any collision among themselves, he declared that all things should be in common; that no member of society should exercise any authority over another, and that the distinctions of master and lord should be for ever proscribed from the world. In regard to true faith, he professed that all external worship should be abolished as dangerous and immoral, and that the sacraments should be suppressed as absurd and ridiculous.

Fox drew around him a large number of disciples of every age, sex, and condition, who attracted the respect of the people by an incorruptible probity in their commercial relations, and by the spirit of concord, devotion, and fraternity which reigned among them. Filled with simplicity in their manners and dress, the disciples of Fox were distinguished from other sects by their horror of falsehood, and even of every chance word; thus the use of an oath was severely forbidden them; because, said the master, "it adds no value to the words of a man who speaks the truth."

The leader however of this new sect, notwithstanding the regularity of his morals and the mildness of his character, was not the less pursued for having preached against inebriety and the payment of tithes. A sermon against legal proceedings also drew on him the animadversion of the magistrates, and he was one day arrested for having announced that the Lord had forbidden him to bend his knee before any power on the earth, nor from submitting to any authority. Being brought before the judge, he presented himself with his leather cap upon his head; and in his interrogation, he refused to speak to the magistrate in the usual forms of language. The latter called him insolent, and inflicted a blow upon him; Fox turned the other cheek to him; the judge declared that he was crazy, and sent him to a lunatic hospital, with orders to whip him twice a day.

The noise of this singular arrest having at length reached London, Cromwell had the curiosity to see Fox, brought him to the capital, and after having spent an hour with him, set him at liberty. From that time the founder of the Quakers openly professed his doctrine, and prodigiously increased the number of his disciples.

The sects which rose up in every quarter, in France, Italy, Germany, and England, excited the more the anger, of the Holy See, since they threatened its temporal power; thus the congregation charged with the management of affairs did not cease to fulminate anathemas, now against the Quietists, now against the Jansenists, now against the Quakers.

Although Alexander the Seventh was of notorious impiety, and publicly proclaimed his atheism, he still gave his approval to all rigorous measures; and through a singular contradiction, this man who joked with his cardinals about the virginity of the mother of Christ, and the simplicity of St. Joseph, and who was so lavish of the dogmas of Catholicism, exhibited the greatest jealousy concerning his privilege of infallibility, and wished to establish it as an article of faith, that at all times, the pope, in his capacity as vicar of God, is the summary and expression of human science, and that consequently all minds should bend and bow before his.

He addressed the following brief on this subject to the doctors of the university of Louvain: "Know, my brethren, that it is absolutely necessary to listen to the voice of the chief shepherd, the vicar of Christ, and to obey him, not only in all that concerns our safety and eternal life, but even in every thing scientific or doctrinal. For if all men, and especially men of letters and science, do not adhere immutably in all their ideas and determinations, without restriction or reserve, to the apostolic decisions, the curiosity inherent in the human mind will draw them into an incredible multitude of vain opinions and foolish errors; there are ways in infinite number for error, but there is but one for the truth; that of submitting to the decision of the pope, who is infallible like God, whose vicar he is."

Notwithstanding the proud pretensions of his holiness to omniscience and universal sway, no sovereign was willing to accept Alexander as the arbiter of his destinies, and all even affected no longer to consult the court of Rome on political matters. Thus the kings of France and Spain, who were at war, did not fear to conclude a peace without informing the pope of it; and all the deference they showed for the Holy See was, to mention in the preamble of the treaty, that their Catholic and most Christian majesties did not doubt that the prayers of the sovereign pontiff, addressed to God for the repose of Christendom, had contributed to lead to this happy result. Alexander exhibited great irritation at this want of attention on the part of Don Louis de Haro and the cardinal Mazarin, the two plenipotentiaries of the courts of France and Spain; he manifested especially his ill will for the cardinal minister, and sought every means of counteracting him in his ulterior negotiations.

The occasion was not long wanting; the Venetians, exhausted in men and money by the wars they maintained against the Turks, had applied to France for aid, and had obtained from Cardinal Mazarin a body of troops, which the prince of Este was to lead to them, and the formal promise of deciding the pope to second them powerfully in their wars against the infidels. But Alexander, charmed with the opportunity of taking vengeance for the affront he had received, and of showing that his will was to be held of some account in the councils of princes, refused to enter into the league against the Turks, and replied dryly to the French ambassadors, that if Mazarin desired to convert the infidel, nothing was easier than to send the fanatic Vincent de Paul into their country, or that if he wished to get up a crusade, he had nothing to do but place himself at the head of the troops, and make the attempt; but that he must not expect the Holy See to throw itself into an extravagant enterprise; that besides the apostolic treasury was dry, and that if he should create new subsidies, it would assuredly not be to levy troops, but to finish the numerous monuments which were in course of execution.

Since the commencement of his reign, Alexander, in fact, appeared to place his whole glory in surpassing his predecessors by his gigantic constructions; especially did he raise palaces, open streets, plant gardens. At his command the Salviati palace disappeared to form the square of the Roman college; in the midst of the place Colonna, he reared a magnificent palace, which he destined for his family, and the square of St. Peter was embellished by a colossal monument, composed of two hundred and eighty-one columns and eighty-eight pillars.

This passion for masonry, joined to the love of the holy father for his family, led him into such enormous expenses, that he was under the necessity of loading the people with imposts, and giving an unmeasured extension to the trade in relics, indulgences, absolutions, annates, and prebends. His cupidity was so universally recognised at Rome, that they openly sold a satirical engraving, representing Alexander the Seventh, with his minions, mistresses, and cardinals, at the feet of an image of Christ, which, instead of blood, permitted pieces of gold and silver to escape from his side, which the pope received in his tiara, repeating, in the form of a litany, "He was crucified only for us."

To heighten the infamy, Father Oliva, the general of the Jesuits, preached in the churches, "that all the actions of the pope were holy and meritorious, and that it was for the good of the faithful, that Alexander the Seventh and his cardinals resigned themselves to being rich, and to obey these words of the canticle of canticles, 'How beautiful are thy breasts, my sister, my spouse.'" The astute disciple of Ignatius Loyola added, "that God was unwilling his church should have a withered breast, like the Amazons described in the works of profane authors, but that her breast was adorned with two redundant paps, that princes and bishops might be nourished with abundant milk."

Not only did his holiness not neglect any occasion to stimulate the charity of his own subjects, for the greater glory of God, but he even sought to usurp the domains of his neighbours, always, however, for the same principle, and solemnly decreed the incarceration of Castro and Comachio, without being stopped by the fear of exposing himself to a terrible war with Louis the Fourteenth and Philip the Fourth, who had engaged to cause these cities to be restored to the families of the Este and the Farnese, their lawful owners.

Still further, Alexander the Seventh having assured himself, by a treaty, of the assistance of the emperor of Germany, preserved no more restraint towards France; he even publicly insulted, by means of the Corsicans of his body guard, the people of the duke de Crequi, the French ambassador, which produced a bloody collision. The Corsicans, having had some of their number killed or wounded, wished to take revenge, assembled to the number of more than four hundred, and advanced in arms, with drums beating and colours flying, towards the palace of the ambassador, seized on the avenues and streets which led to it, and prepared to assault it. The duke de Crequi appeared in his balcony, to cause his character, as ambassador, to be respected by the soldiers of the pope, but instead of listening to him, they fired upon him. Fortunately, he was not struck, and the balls only broke the panes of glass of his apartment. Almost at the same moment, they discharged their muskets at the carriage of the embassadress, who was endeavouring to return to the palace, and killed the page at the door. Finally, nothing but the interference of the ambassadors of the other powers put an end to the disorders.

The duke de Crequi protested against such a violation of the law of nations, and demanded the punishment of the guilty; the holy father refused to give him satisfaction, or even to withdraw the posts of the Corsicans, which were around the palace of the French embassy. It was not possible to push insolence further; then the duke de Crequi, after having protested against such conduct before the representatives of the other powers, declared that he was no longer in safety in Rome and retired to San Quirico, on the frontiers of Tuscany.

As soon as these events were known at the court of France, they excited extraordinary ferment in every mind; Louis the Fourteenth, who, since the death of Mazarin, had placed himself at the head of affairs in the kingdom, was so indignant, that he swore to punish the audacious pontiff, and to go to Rome to burn him. He immediately drove the nuncio Piccolomini from Paris, enjoined on him to retire to Meaux, and there to await his pleasure; and as he learned that the latter, instead of obeying, had taken the road for St. Denis, he sent a company of horse musketeers in pursuit of him, and had him conducted to the frontiers of Savoy.

When Piccolomini arrived at Rome, his holiness received letters from the cardinal of Arragon, and the grand duke of Tuscany, which announced to him that France had demanded from the Spaniards a passage through the Milanese territory, for an army which was assembling under the orders of Marshal Plessis Prashim, destined to invade the ecclesiastical states. Alexander thought that these preparations were only intended to alarm him, and when the duke de Crequi notified him that France demanded, as a reparation for the insults committed to her ambassador, that his brother, Don Mario Chigi, governor of Rome, should be exiled to Sienna, for not having succoured him against the Corsican guards; that the hat should be taken from Cardinal Imperiali; that the Corsican troops should be banished for ever from Rome; that a pyramid should be erected in the midst of the place Farnese, having a disgraceful inscription, for the attempt committed on the person of an ambassador; that the city of Castro should be restored to the Farnese, and that of Camachio to the house of Este: the pope in reply appointed the cardinal Imperiali legate of Romagna, gave a month's pay to his Corsican guards as a gratuity, added new benefices to the revenues of his brother, and published that he would never effect the disincorporation of Castro, since the pontifical bulls commanded him to increase the domains of the church, and expressly prohibited from ever reducing them. "We are determined," added his holiness in his brief, "to expose the ecclesiastical state, and even our own life to the sanguinary violences of kings, in support of the sacred rights of our see; but we will never succumb without having set to work, in our defence, all the aid we can obtain from men; and if they are insufficient, we will pray to God to send us legions of angels from heaven to combat in our favour."

As he had announced, the pontiff, having to enlist angels beneath the standard of the church, summoned Leopold the First to keep his promises, and send an army into Italy to defend the Holy See, whilst he should attack France on the other side. But the emperor, who not desirous of entering into hostilities with Louis the Fourteenth since the recent victories of the generals of that monarch, refused to keep the engagements he had made with the Holy See, and merely gave it permission to levy troops in the states of the empire. His holiness exclaimed against this want of faith, but dared not openly break with the emperor at so critical a moment; he decided to accept the last proposition of Leopold, and levied German troops, to join them to the twenty thousand foot and two thousand cavalry who were already enrolled under the flag of the court of Rome.

Whilst Louis the Fourteenth, putting his threats against the Holy See in execution, was seizing on the city of Avignon and on Provence, and was preparing to invade Italy, by one of those aberrations of the human mind so common among kings, his majesty was pursuing, with bitterness, the detractors of pontifical authority, and was taking the part of the Jesuits against the Jansenists. The Jesuits, aided by the monarch, had induced the Sorbonne to condemn the Provincial Letters of Pascal, and the disquisitions of Paul Ireneus, and had caused the ordinances against defamatory libels and heretical writings to be applied to them.

Vincent de Paul, who had been one of the instigators of this iniquitous judgment, also employed his efforts to have adopted the formula concerning the condemnation of the five propositions, and which the general assembly of the clergy of France had drawn up, but without, however, being able to conquer the obstinate resistance of the Jansenists. Finally, at his solicitation, and that of his confessor, Louis the Fourteenth took a part in this important matter, and to constrain the solitaires of Port Royal to submit to the decisions of the pope, he drove Marie Angelique Arnaud and the nuns from their retreat, and dispersed the pious monks among different convents.

The great king pursued no less his war with the Holy See, and his troops had penetrated the Milanese territory, when Alexander, alarmed by their progress, and fearful of seeing the states of the church in fire and blood, Rome sacked, and himself driven from the apostolic throne, consented to make a reparation for the insults which France had received in the person of its ambassador. His holiness accordingly signed the treaty of Pisa, bound himself to raise a pyramid in token of expiation, as the duke de Crequi had demanded, and to banish the Corsicans for ever from the territories of the church, and took an oath publicly, that no officer of his court, or member of his family, had taken the least part in the attempt of which the king of France complained; which, however, did not hinder him, six days after having ratified the treaty of Pisa, from drawing up with his own hand, and depositing in the archives of the castle of San Angelo, the following protest as a proof of his distinguished knavery: "Of our own motion and knowledge, in the plenitude of our power we declare, that we concluded peace with Louis the Fourteenth through constraint and the fear which the army of that despot inspired in us; we protest before God and the glorious apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, that we have not consented sincerely to any of the acts that we have signed, nor to any of the numerous satisfactions we have sworn to give that king. Far from desiring to fulfil our engagements, we declare that we oppose their execution, and chiefly the disincameration of Castro and Comachio; we declare our promises null and void; we declare moreover that the present protest shall be valid, and that it shall have full and entire efficacy, though it be not registered in the public acts; finally, we wish it to bear testimony of our true will, in all times and places, for the advantage of the Holy See; we supply by the plenitude of our power, and the infallibility of our decisions, all irregularities which may be in this act, notwithstanding the usages, styles, laws, decretals, apostolic constitutions, statutes, and every thing which may be contrary to it."

Alexander the Seventh appeared, however, to submit, and sent the cardinal Fabio Chigi to the court of France, under the pretext of making the excuses of the Holy See to Louis the Fourteenth; but in reality to excite troubles in the kingdom. The cardinal nephew had scarcely arrived in Paris, when he resumed the train of life he led at Rome, and gave rise to such scandals that the satiric poets made epigrams and vaudevilles on his amours with the ladies of the court, and his infamous liaisons with the young clerks of his train.

But in the midst of his debaucheries and intrigues of gallantry, Fabio Chigi did not neglect the affairs of the church, and acquitted himself faithfully of his mission by animating the Jesuits against the king, and by sustaining those who in their writings placed the power of the states-general above the authority of the monarch. The nuncio even encouraged Father Moya, the confessor of the queen mother, to publish two works under the pseudonymic of Jacques de Vernant, and Amadeus Guimenius, to maintain the doctrines of the Jesuits in all that concerned the submission of princes to the Roman church.

The despot, who was more jealous of his absolute authority than of any thing else in the world, appointed a commission of inquiry, and had them condemned as subversive of all temporal authority and public morals. Alexander immediately addressed a brief to his most Christian majesty, beseeching him to have the sentence pronounced by the Sorbonne revoked; the parliament opposed the brief, and published the following declaration:

"Two most condemnable books have appeared; the first contained maxims subversive of lawful government; the second a great number of propositions dangerous to morality. The faculty of Theology, recognising that simony, rebellion, prostitution, robbery, and murder were extolled in those writings, thought it was its duty to oppose the progress of these pernicious doctrines. The pope has thought otherwise; he annuls the censures, and orders that these infamous books should be scattered through the country for the edification of the faithful. Notwithstanding the pretended infallibility of the Holy See, we declare that the king cannot, without making an encroachment on his authority and injuring the rights of his crown, grant to the pontiff the satisfaction he asks in his brief."

The censures of the faculty having been maintained, Alexander the Seventh fulminated a terrible bull, in which he declared the decisions of the Sorbonne to be presumptuous, scandalous, and rash, and prohibited all ecclesiastics from receiving them under penalty of excommunication. This bull did not cause the slightest sensation in France, and the pope dared not go further, for fear of a serious rupture with Louis the Fourteenth.

What contributed to render him more moderate, was the sending of a considerable sum by the monarch for the canonization of St. Francis of Sales, titular bishop and prince of Geneva, and for the purchase of relics which he wished to deposit in the different churches of the capital. Alexander sent faithfully the brevet of saint which was demanded of him; he also sent three boxes of relics, done up with great care, tied with cords of red silk, and sealed with the seals of Cardinal Genesti, to whom was committed the guardianship of the remains of martyrs and saints.

Unfortunately, the holy boxes were received, on their arrival in Paris, by a bishop who secretly favoured Jansenism; the prelate, under the appearance of the most ardent zeal, and the most artless faith, asked permission for physicians and anatomists to assist at the opening, in order to point out to what parts of the body the bones of the blessed martyrs belonged. This verification produced singular discoveries. The anatomists having proceeded to open the first box, on which was written a legend indicating that it contained the remains of two celebrated martyrs, discovered bones with which to form three skeletons instead of two. The cardinal Fabio Chigi, who was present, skilfully threw the blame on the scribe who had set down the legend.

In the second trunk were found, in the midst of human bones, three thigh bones of asses, and two of the inward bones of the legs of dogs, with other remains of bones which had belonged to different domestic animals. The cardinal legate could scarcely restrain his laughter whilst listening to the analysis of the relics expedited by his uncle; he was not, however, disconcerted, and contented himself with saying that the devil had, doubtless, added these bones out of malice, in order to prove their faith.

Finally, in the third case, which, in accordance with the brief of his holiness, was to contain the head of St. Fortunus, was found a death's head, perfectly resembling a dissected skull; but a physician having thrown it into a vessel filled with boiling water, the head of St. Fortunus lost its proper shape, and was found to be merely a skull of painted pasteboard. Fabio Chigi dared not explain this miracle, and retired covered with confusion. The anatomists prepared a report for his majesty on what they had discovered, and affirmed, moreover, that the bones sent from Rome, as having belonged to holy persons of the first centuries, were, on the contrary, those of individuals recently dead, and that thus the great king had been the dupe of an infamous piece of jugglery.

Louis the Fourteenth, fearful lest this affair should cover him with ridicule, and make him the jest of Europe, if it were noised about, threw the report of the anatomists into the fire, and prohibited them from telling what they knew, under penalty of being thrown into the dungeons of the bastille. He then commanded that they should replace the bones in boxes, closed and sealed up, and distribute them to the churches of Paris.

In England great changes had taken place; Oliver Cromwell was dead. His son Richard, who had at first taken the reins of government, determined to abdicate and resign the supreme authority into the hands of the members of parliament. This new government was overthrown by General Monk, a traitor, who had sold himself to the son of Charles Stuart, and who, for a little gold, delivered up his country to a cowardly, hypocritical, sanguinary, and despotic king. Charles the Second was, finally, seated on the throne of Great Britain.

The new sovereign, who had become a Catholic during his exile, and who knew the invincible repugnance of the English for the papacy, appeared in the beginning to have returned to the reformed religion, and communed in public, in accordance with the English ritual; but in secret he continued to profess Catholicism, and followed all its exercises in a mysterious chapel served by Jesuits.

When his power was more confirmed, he imposed less constraint on himself, and commenced a religious persecution, which had for its apparent cause, the tranquillity of the state, and for its real end, the triumph of Catholicism. He first published severe regulations against the nonconformists, and the Presbyterians; he re-instated the bishops suspected of papacy, and who had been degraded by an act of parliament; he prepared a bill against the Quakers, who refused to take an oath of obedience to him; he published the famous act of uniformity in worship, and prohibited ministers who had not been ordained by a bishop to administer the communion to the faithful, and enjoined on the inhabitants of the three kingdoms, to adopt the English liturgy and the book of Common Prayer.

These ordinances, which were all opposed to the national spirit, forced more than two thousand reformed ministers to renounce their churches, which, however, did not prevent the disloyal Charles the Second from persevering in his odious path. To increase the misfortunes, the plague broke out in London, and carried off a prodigious number of victims; then a fire, kindled, it is said, by the Jesuits, almost entirely consumed the capital.

The Scotch wished to take advantage of these circumstances to break the yoke, and drive off the English bishops whom Charles Stuart had imposed on them; but the tyrant was on his guard; a formidable army passed the Tweed, entered Scotland, defeated the Presbyterians, and forced them to lay down their arms.

The court of Rome hastened to congratulate Charles the Second and his brother, the duke of York, on the vigour they had displayed against the heretics, and offered them his assistance, in advancing the work of the regeneration of Catholicism in Great Britain, that is to say, the extermination of all heretics.

It would be unjust, however, to cast on the holy father all the odium of the measures which were taken in England, France, and Italy against heretics, as well as the infamy of the executions which embued in blood the English cities, the provinces of the south of France, and the valleys of Piedmont. He was already attacked by an extremely severe illness, and was not in a condition to be able to occupy himself about the organization of massacres. He died, at last, on the 22d of May, 1667, and went to join in eternity the execrable pontiffs who had preceded him.

CLEMENT THE NINTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1667.]

Simoniacal election of Clement the Ninth—He declares against the abuses of nepotism—New political tendencies of the papal government—His holiness prohibits the works of the savants of Port Royal from being read—Louis the Fourteenth wishes the pope to become the godfather of the dauphin of France—Divorce of the king of Portugal—The pontiff consents to appoint prelates to the vacant sees in Portugal—The Jesuits deliver the Isle of Candia to the Mahometans—Their treason the cause of the death of the holy father.

TWENTY-SEVEN days after the death of Alexander the Seventh, the cardinals chose Julius Rospigliosi to succeed him, who was immediately proclaimed the supreme head of the church, by the name of Clement the Ninth. The new pope, originally from the town of Pistoia, in Tuscany, had successively filled the posts of auditor of legation, nuncio in Spain, governor of Rome, cardinal of St. Sixtus, and secretary of state.

Some ecclesiastical authors maintain that his election was not exempt from simoniacal stipulations; to support this opinion, they point to the care which he took to maintain, in their dignities, the members of the sacred college who had sustained his party, and the exclusion which he inflicted on those who had opposed his election. Other writers refuse to see a proof of simony in his preferences for certain cardinals, and represent him as the most worthy and most capable of occupying the Holy See. They agree that he did not possess an activity proportioned to his laudable intentions, and compare him to a tree covered with vigorous branches which produce leaves in abundance, sometimes flowers and never fruits. It is certain that he possessed that species of negative virtues which consists in the absence of vices. Thus, whilst refusing to imitate his predecessors in their nepotism, and to sacrifice the interests of the church to his relatives, he did not the less call them to court to place them in possession of lucrative offices; he was only unwilling to place them at the head of the government.

This propensity of the new pontiff to leave the exercise of authority in the hands of the princes of the church, was, moreover, in harmony with the ideas of the period; for an aristocratic reaction was manifesting itself in all the courts of Europe. In France, Louis the Fourteenth was surrounding himself with his nobility, to make a rampart of them against the burghers, and was giving to their care all the offices of the state; in Spain, the grandees governed the monarchy; in Germany, the nobility was obtaining a decided preponderance; in Poland, it had assumed to itself the election of the kings; in Sweden and Russia, it had dictated restrictive dispositions to the prerogatives of the sovereigns. It was then natural for Clement the Ninth to follow the general impulse, and instead of embarking in a struggle with the numerous aristocracy which surrounded the papal throne, he consented to modify the spiritual omnipotence of the court of Rome, under the form of an oligarchical constitution. Governed by the members of his council, he resolved to take an active part in the war against the Turks, by furnishing troops and money to the most serene republic of Venice. As the treasury was empty, he did not hesitate to fill it with sums taken from several convents of men and women, whose wealth had become an object of remark among the faithful. He dared not, however, touch the treasury of the Jesuits, on account of the immense influence which the society exercised over the minds of men; he even sought to attach them firmly to the Holy See, by taking part with them in their quarrels with the Jansenists, and by condemning a translation of the gospel, commonly called the New Testament of Mons, the most remarkable work which had been composed at Port Royal. Clement the Ninth prohibited the reading of it, under penalty of excommunication; pronounced it a rash and pernicious version, and differing from the Vulgate; after his example, the archbishops of Paris, Embrun and Reims, the bishops of Evreux, Amiens, and several other prelates, declared that it was filled with additions and arbitrary changes, and was conformed to the version of Geneva, that is to say, favoured Calvinism. The atrabilious Louis the Fourteenth interfered, and caused the work to be proscribed by his council of state. But on the other side, the bishops who were partizans of the doctrines of Jansenius refused to submit; thus the religious disputes were revived and became more violent than ever.

His holiness then desired to repair the evil he had done; he drew back his brief, and contented himself with anathematising the five propositions attributed to Jansenius, supposing, added he, that these propositions have really emanated from the books of the bishop of Ypres. The Jansenists accepted these conditions, and signed the last formulary of Alexander the Seventh, taking care to specify very clearly the right and the fact, and pointing out that they only promised external respect and the submission of silence. Arnaud and his friends declared, moreover, without ambiguity, that in condemning the five propositions, they had not intended to deny the doctrine of St. Augustine, nor of St. Thomas, nor efficacious grace. Peace was, however, apparently concluded between the Molinists and the Jansenists. The nuns and solitaires of Port Royal were relieved from censures, discharged from the interdict, and permitted to return to their convents. From this time the Jansenists, tolerated by the court of Rome, and supported by the credit of the minister Pomponne, rose to a degree of importance which daily became more considerable; and as they knew very well that they were to expect new attacks from their enemies as soon as the latter found a favourable opportunity, they sought themselves to shackle the Holy See, and prepared to inflict terrible blows on the tottering colossus of the papacy.

Nothing, however, could then foretell the triumph of Jansenism; the court of Rome appeared to be all-powerful in France. The great king had been weak enough to ask Pope Clement, if he would be the godfather of the dauphin, and the holy father had sent a commission as legate extraordinary to the cardinal Vendome, that that prelate might hold the royal child at the baptismal font in his name. The ceremony of the baptism finished, it was supposed that the mission of the cardinal legate was over, and that the absolute power with which he had been momentarily invested, ceased with his functions as godfather; but it turned out otherwise. The prelate, following the example of the Roman pontiff, whose representative he was, wished to use his ecclesiastical omnipotence for the interests of his family; he pronounced the divorce of his niece Maria Francisca d'Aumale, princess of Savoy Nemours, from her husband, Alphonso the Fifth, king of Portugal, a scion of the house of Braganza, for impotence, and authorised her union with Don Pedro, the brother of the king and lover of the young queen.

The court of Spain, which had never yet renounced its hope of recovering possession of the kingdom of Portugal, and which found itself in a good position to make its rights available, in consequence of the troubles which agitated that country, sent an ambassador to the sovereign pontiff, to solicit an annulment of the marriage of Don Pedro to his sister-in-law.

Unfortunately, the thing had become very difficult, the queen having declared that she was pregnant; Clement also secretly favoured France, and some presents which were sent him by Maria d'Aumale, served to gain him to the side of the queen; he confirmed all that had been done by the cardinal of Vendome, and declared her marriage with Alphonso well and truly annulled. Only, to save appearances, and not to be suspected of having yielded to presents, he specified in his bull that he approved of the new union of the queen with Don Pedro, because the evil had become irremediable; but that the Portuguese bishops who had pronounced the divorce under pretext of impotence on the part of the husband, were greatly guilty before God, for not having submitted the two spouses to the proofs then in use in the church, and which were called the proofs of Congress.

His holiness not only confirmed the marriage of Don Pedro and the queen, but even consented to make nominations to all the vacant bishoprics; which the court of Rome had refused to do up to this time. In consequence of this concession, the king of Spain was compelled to recognise the independence of Portugal. Clement the Ninth congratulated himself the more on the success of his policy towards these two countries, since he counted on it to use the influence he had acquired over their princes, to obtain from them succours in men and money, to push the war vigorously against the Turks. Unfortunately, he had not time to realise his plans; he learned that the Turks had seized on Candia, notwithstanding the brave defence of the Venetian garrison, and that it had fallen into the power of the sultan Mahomet the Fourth, in consequence of the treason of the Jesuits.

This news chagrined the holy father so violently, that he was seized with a fever, of which he died on the 9th of December, 1669. Father Nodot endeavours to free the society from the accusation of having caused the death of Clement the Ninth, and maintains that his holiness, who was addicted to intemperance, had simply died of indigestion, brought on by his excesses at table.

CLEMENT THE TENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1670.]

Vacancy in the Holy See—Election of Clement the Tenth—Nepotism of the new pope—Cardinal Pauluzzi governs the church—The Holy See during this reign loses a part of its political influence—Beginning of the quarrel about the right of regale—Hatred of Louis the Fourteenth to the Jansenists—Shameful vices of the holy father—He dies, destroyed by drunkenness.*

THE cardinals having entered the conclave on the 20th of December, that is to say, eleven days after the death of Clement the Ninth, had not been able to choose a pope at the end of four months, in consequence of the intrigues which divided the sacred college.

* A right belonging formerly to the kings of France, of enjoying the revenues of vacant bishoprics.

Finally, in the last part of the month of April, the factions of the Chigi, Barberini, and Rospigliosi, until that time so hostile to each other, united, and proclaimed as sovereign pontiff by adoration, Emilius Altieri, an old man of eighty years of age, who was enthroned by the name of Clement the Tenth.

The family of the new pope was one of the oldest in Rome, and noble after the fashion of Italy, where those who could live without exercising professions take the title of gentleman, and purchase the right to be called count or marquis. As Altieri had only nieces, he solemnly adopted as cardinal nephew, Antonio Pauluzzi, the brother-in-law of Gasparo Pauluzzi, who had married Dona Laura, one of his relatives, and loaded all the members of his new family with dignities and favours. He made Antonio cardinal padrone, first minister, with a salary of a hundred thousand crowns; elevated his brother, Don Angelo, to the dignity of general of the galleys, and gratified Don Gasparo with the post of generalissimo of the pontifical troops.

When he had sufficiently provided his adopted family with lands, benefices, domains, and principalities, he reposed himself, and placed all the burthen of the government of the church in the hands of the cardinal nephew, who used it to increase his fortune, without troubling himself about the misfortunes of the people, nor the terrible wars which the sovereigns were carrying on. We should say, however, that his efforts to arrest the evil would not have produced any result; for the European powers having taken up a position of complete independence of the Holy See, the influence of the Roman court was annihilated in the great political interests which actuated sovereigns.

The Catholic world was divided into two hostile camps, the French and Austrian parties, both seeking to annihilate each other, both employing all their efforts to insure success in the strife, and both preferring their political interests to those of religion. Thus, although a bigoted Catholic, Louis the Fourteenth, instead of obeying the pope, wished to point out a line of conduct to him; and in his displeasure at seeing that Clement the Tenth, and his nephew Pauluzzi Altieri, favoured the house of Austria, he encroached on the spiritual power, confiscated ecclesiastical property by his own authority, claimed the right of establishing military pensions chargeable on the benefices of the church, declared by an edict that the sovereign had the right to collect the revenues of a bishopric during its vacancy, and to confer the benefices which were dependent on it, a right which became celebrated by the name of regale; and, finally, which was a terrible blow to the Holy See, he placed the receivers or bearers of the Roman rents under strict surveillance, to prevent the faithful from sending so much money as was done to the court of Rome for the purchase of indulgences.

The sovereign pontiff protested feebly against the usurpation of ecclesiastical privileges by the temporal power, at first because his protests would not have been listened to, and then because he was altogether incapable of taking an energetic resolution, the abuse of strong liquors having plunged him into a state of almost constant idiocy. A very curious anecdote is told on the subject of the holy father's habit of drunkenness. "One night," says the Italian chronicler, "when his holiness had become drunk, as usual, with a monk of St. Sylvester, his confessor, he took a fancy to make this unworthy frockling archbishop, and his butler a cardinal. The patents were signed, and the next day Antonio Pauluzzi had great difficulty in preventing the titularies from using these papers, and claiming the benefit of their commissions."

In France, the quarrels between the Jansenists and the Molinists broke out anew, and threatened to disturb the kingdom seriously. The Jesuits pursued their adversaries to the utmost, and such was their hatred against the solitaires of Port Royal, that they preferred to see atheism triumph rather than tolerate the propagation of Jansenism; thus they caused a criticism which the learned Perrault published on them, under the title of "The Practical Morality of the Jesuits," to be burned by the hands of the executioner, whilst they did not make the slightest complaint against "The Theological and Political Treatise," which the celebrated Jew, Benedict Spinoza, published, and in which the author maintained that God was not an infinitely perfect being; that he was not even endowed with intelligence; in a word, that the Divinity was nothing else than that force, or that vague energy of nature, which thinks in men, feels in animals, vegetates in plants, and which resembles the atoms of inert matter.

This material pantheism found no contradiction on its appearance among the Catholics, not even in Rome. It is true that they paid no attention to religion, and that it mattered little to the cardinal nephew what belief the faithful had, so they regularly paid the taxes and imposts which he laid upon them.

Antonio Pauluzzi was at last obliged to resign the supreme power. The holy father, weakened by old age, and worn out by intoxication, fell into a prostration, which took from him even the power of motion, and carried him off, the 26th of July, 1676.

* S. Cath - Encyclopedia - Concordat Jansen -

INNOCENT THE ELEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1676.]

Election of Innocent the Eleventh—History of the pope before his exaltation—Quarrels between the new pontiff and Louis the Fourteenth—Father la Chaise, the confessor of Louis the Fourteenth—Synod of the bishops of France—The four propositions of the liberties of the Gallican church—Innocent anathematizes the French prelates who assisted at the national council—Catholic reaction in England—Conspiracy of the papists—The English parliament causes a large number of Jesuits to be arrested—Sir Edmonbury Godfrey is assassinated by order of the queen of England—Bill excluding the fanatical duke of York, the brother of the king, from the throne of Great Britain—Charles the Second dismisses the parliament, and murders his subjects—The Whigs and Tories—Death of Charles the Second—Fanaticism of Louis the Fourteenth—Revocation of the edict of Nantz—James the Second on the throne of England—Punishment of Monmouth—Condemnation of the Quietist Michel Molinos—Abolition of the franchises for ambassadors at Rome—Louis the Fourteenth causes the pope to be insulted by the marquis de Lavardin—Death of Innocent.

THE cardinals entered into conclave on the very night of the funeral of Clement the Tenth; as usual, intrigue decided the election, and after two months of struggle and sharp shooting, the members of the conclave proclaimed as sovereign pontiff, the son of a banker, the cardinal Odescalchi, who was adored by the name of Innocent the Eleventh.

This pope, who was of an imperious, lofty, and determined character, was born in the kingdom of Austria; before embracing the ecclesiastical career, he had followed the trade of arms, and when he put on the tiara, there might still be seen on his brow the mark the casque had left there.

Louis the Fourteenth appeared to him to be a rival worthy of him, and against whom he might display his double warlike and sacerdotal energy. The moment was the more opportune for a rupture with that monarch, as he was at war with the apostolic Roman emperor, Leopold of Austria, and as Charles the Second of Spain, and Charles the Fourth, duke of Lorraine, were leagued with the heretics of the United Provinces to weaken the most Christian king, who, on his side, had made an alliance with Mahomet the Fourth, emperor of the Turks. The pope seized the pretext of the right of regale, which Louis the Fourteenth claimed, and declared that the sovereign had not the right to abuse this custom established in France, to dispose of the rentals and benefices of vacant sees, nor to seize on the revenues of abbeys and churches, without regard to their exemptions, their immunities, and their privileges.

The holy father was sustained in his step by the Jesuits, and even by the Jansenist prelates; still, he dared not come to an open rupture with Louis the Fourteenth, and contented himself with merely sending him a brief of warning. The moderation of the sovereign pontiff was induced by the financial situation of the Holy See; as the expenses had exceeded the receipts by a considerable sum, it was apprehended lest the least difficulty should bring on bankruptcy. Innocent then wished to gain time, to ward off the inconvenience of such a situation. He first suppressed the enormous emoluments paid to the nephews of dead popes or their creatures, he abolished a crowd of useless offices, restored order to the administration of the finances, laid taxes on the nobles who had been exempted from them; he then reduced the interest on the funded debt to three per cent., made new assessments, doubled the taxes, and restored an equilibrium between the receipts and expenses.

When the skilful pontiff had placed things on a good footing, he resumed his plans against Louis the Fourteenth, and wrote to him, "Most dear son in Jesus Christ, we have already represented to your majesty how much the ordinance, which was published during the reign of our predecessor, concerning the regale, was injurious to ecclesiastical freedom, contrary to divine and human law, and remote from the examples and customs bequeathed to us by the ancient kings. We have, however, learned that your agents trample under foot the authority of the bishops, trouble the order and discipline of the church, openly, and with the assent of the royal power. We will not accuse your majesty of these deplorable outrages; we will throw the blame upon your counsellors, who have not courageously warned you that you are wandering from the right path; who have not told you to remember that you swore before God to shed your blood in the maintenance of the faith, and the defence of the liberties of his holy church; we will excommunicate those cowardly courtiers who have not recalled to you that God should be obeyed above men, that the life of kings and princes passes by as rapidly as a flash of lightning, that the most powerful of sovereigns, as well as the lowest of his subjects, after that terrible instant, called before the tribunal of the Eternal, appears there without sceptre, crown, mantle of purple, guards, suite, nor any of the terrestrial insignia of his mundane power; that there your majesty will have but your crimes as your train, and that around it will arise the victims of your cruelty appealing for vengeance.

"We, who do not dread to make you hear the energetic language of truth, and who desire to prevent you from heaping up the measure of your iniquities, we inform you, that your edict about the regale is an impious work, and that you cannot hasten too soon to repeal it, to merit your pardon before God. We are not ignorant that you seek to make compensation for the crimes of your life by praiseworthy actions, that you destroy the synagogues, that you persecute the heretics, and that you wish to prepare yourself for the infinite recompenses of heaven; but be careful that your left hand does not overthrow that which your right hand builds up, and remember that the apostle has said, 'he who falls voluntarily into sin, loses the merit of his pious works.'

"We are rent with grief when thinking that death may surprise you, whilst your conscience is burthened with the most execrable iniquities; we thus hasten to cry to you on behalf of God, 'Repeal the ordinance of the regale, abolish all you have undertaken against the liberty and the temporal rights of the church, or dread my indignation.' If, after this new warning, you do not obey the orders of God, if your majesty does not quit the fatal path on which you have entered, we will use against you the terrible arms which Jesus Christ has placed in our hands. The performance of our duty will certainly expose us to terrible tempests, but in this holy strife we will place our glory in suffering for the cross of Jesus Christ.

"Given at Rome, on the 22d of December, 1679."

Whilst appearing to have only the interests of religion in view, it was easy to perceive, that the pope thought only of re-establishing the omnipotence of the Holy See; it was also evident that Louis the Fourteenth, under pretext of maintaining the rights of his crown, wished to make himself master of the ecclesiastical benefices, make the clergy dependent on him, and use them to rule the people.

Innocent the Eleventh had already divined Louis the Fourteenth, and the latter had penetrated the secret hopes of the holy father; the struggle then commenced between royalty and the papacy.

Never had a prince governed his empire more despotically than Louis the Fourteenth, and been more entirely the master of his subjects; all, nobles, priests, and burghers were trampled like vile slaves beneath his feet, and the prince of Condé, to paint the subjection of the clergy, said, "that if the king should take a fancy to embrace protestanism, the priests would be the first to imitate him." Father la Chaise himself, the great nephew of Father Cotton, who had become in his turn confessor of the king, and who for fifteen years directed the conscience of Louis the Fourteenth, had joined in the views of the monarch concerning the regale, and, though a Jesuit, opposed the Holy See. Some historians accuse the good father of having contributed to inspire his august penitent with the desire to break entirely the yoke of the court of Rome, in order to have the list of livings in the king's gift at his disposal.

Instead of obeying the injunctions of the pope, Louis the Fourteenth assembled the principal prelates of the kingdom in council, in the palace of Monseigneur Marca, the metropolitan of Paris, and placed the matter before them. They who followed the lead of Father la Chaise, were careful not to contradict him, and confirmed the right of regale over all the churches of France. The archbishop of Paris even wrote a very badly digested work on the subject, called "The Agreement between the Priesthood and the Empire." Innocent the Eleventh immediately ordered his canonists to refute this book, and renewed his remonstrances to Louis the Fourteenth to abandon his pretensions to the regale. The monarch, finding himself sustained by the clergy, stood firm, refused to submit, and using as a pretext that the liberties of the Gallican church were in danger from the encroachments of the court of Rome, convened a national council to defend the rights of his crown.

Bossuet, the illustrious bishop of Meaux, who had been gained over to the cause of the king, opened the sitting in an extremely skilful discourse; he affected the most respectful deference for the Roman church, called it the mother, the nurse, the mistress of all the churches, insinuating, however, that it was necessary to examine the fundamental rights of civil power and religious authority. After five months of deliberations, the assembly published the four following propositions, which comprehended what is called, in our days, the liberties of the Gallican church:

1. "The pope and universal church have no authority, direct or indirect, over the temporal concerns of princes, and cannot depose sovereigns, nor free their subjects from the oath of fidelity.

2. "The authority of general councils is above that of the popes, as was decided in the fourth and fifth sessions of the council of Constance, a decision which the church of France recognises as universally approved of, and applicable even to times in which there is no schism.

3. "The authority of the see of Rome in matters of discipline, receives its force from the consent of the other churches, and the exercise of supreme ecclesiastical power should be regulated by the canons.

4. "On questions of faith, the decisions of the pope are not infallible; they only become so from the approval of the church."

These propositions, which were principally the work of Bossuet, were signed by eight archbishops, twenty-six bishops, and twenty-four deputies of the second order of the clergy. The king ordered them to be accepted and taught in all the universities, in the faculties of theology and the canon law, by a perpetual and irrevocable edict. Innocent the Eleventh was so indignant at them, that he immediately assembled the sacred college, and pronounced in full consistory an excommunication against all the prelates who had assisted at the council, and caused the four propositions they had decreed, to be burned by the hand of the executioner. His holiness did not confine himself to that; comprehending that his powerless thunders would not intimidate the French clergy, he determined to create for himself defenders even in the ranks of his enemies, and to corrupt, instead of threatening.

In conformity with his instructions, the legate sought to reconcile himself with the Jansenists; he even made overtures to the theologian Arnaud, and to some other solitaires of Port Royal, and offered them the hat of a cardinal, if they would embrace the cause of the pope, and defend the omnipotence of the Holy See. Arnaud rejected the proposals of the legate, and wrote in favour of the maxims published by the French ecclesiastics. But some of the disciples of the abbot of St. Cyran proved to be better disposed, amongst others the monks Sfondrati and d'Aguierre; they were decorated with the Roman purple, gratified with rich benefices—and in exchange, they declaimed against the national council of 1682.

Louis the Fourteenth, on his side, distributed sees and abbeys to the signers of the declaration, so as to prevent defections; and as his holiness refused to grant canonical institution to the proteges of the king, it resulted in the churches having pastors who could neither receive ordination, nor exercise any spiritual power. Thus the difference between the courts of Rome and France became every day more serious.

In England, things were also beginning to take a turn less favourable to the interests of the Holy See. The murmurs of the people and the representations of parliament had reminded Charles the Second that the head of his father had fallen beneath the axe of the executioner. The prince appeared to have abandoned his extravagant project of absolute monarchy, and of the restoration of papacy into the kingdom of Great Britain; he even affected a great desire to become popular, and married his niece to the prince of Orange. All this was but trick and knavery, and the discovery of the famous conspiracy of the papists exposed the infamy of the king to open day. This dark conspiracy, which counted among its members bishops, lords, the most influential personages of the court, the duke of York, the brother of the king, Catherine of Portugal, his wife, and the king himself, had as its end to re-establish Catholicism in England, massacre the Presbyterians, and overthrow the constitutional government, to substitute a despotism for it.

Charles the Second had joined the conspirators for this last purpose, and had reserved to himself the right to decide afterwards on the fitness of the measures to be taken to secure the triumph of papacy; his secret intention was to use the Catholics to overthrow the parliament, and then to join the Presbyterians against the papists, so that, favoured by the troubles, he might cause himself to be recognised as an absolute king, that is to say, he counted on betraying at once the English people and the Catholics. But he had to deal with persons more skilful than himself, for the leaders of the conspiracy, whilst appearing submissive to his will, had determined to put him to death, and place his brother, the duke of York, on the throne.

The plot was on the eve of breaking out, when a Jesuit, named Titus Oates, one of the conspirators, yielding to the calls of conscience, went to a magistrate in London, Sir Edmonbury Godfrey, and revealed all that he knew to him. He declared, amongst other things, that the pope, regarding himself as entitled to the possession of England and Ireland, in consequence of the heresy of the sovereign and people, had tacitly adjudged to himself the sovereignty of these two kingdoms, and had placed them in the hands of the Jesuits,—as being the patrimony of St. Peter; that in consequence of this, Father Oliva, the general of their order, had been appointed legate by the Holy See; that several English Catholic lords had also been designated by the pontiff to fill the principal posts in the state; that Lord Arundel was to be created chancellor; Sir William Godolphin keeper of the privy seal; that Coleman, the secretary of the duke of York, was to be promoted to the secretaryship of state; Langhorne to the post of attorney general; Lord Bellasis to the dignity of generalissimo of the armies; Lord Petre to the rank of lieutenant general; and Lord Strafford to the post of treasurer.

He also revealed that the Jesuits, at the instigation of the conspirators, had formed a secret tribunal, in which it had been decided that the king of England, whom they designated by the name of the Black Bastard, was to be poisoned, for having married his niece to a heretic. He said that this decision had been communicated to Father la Chaise, the confessor of the king of France; that the latter had offered ten thousand pounds to Sir George Wakeman, physician to the queen, to take charge of this matter, and that the doctor had exacted fifteen thousand, which had been given him at once.

He also declared that the reverend fathers, fearful lest the doctor should not keep his promise, had employed four banditti, who were to poinard the king in his carriage the day he went to parliament, and that in case their blows should fail, two other conspirators, Gove and Pickering, were to fire on the king with silver balls; that the first had asked fifteen hundred pounds as his pay, and the second thirty thousand masses to ransom him from the flames of purgatory.

He added, that Coleman, the secretary of the duke of York, had in his hands the written order of the secret tribunal, concerning the plan of poisoning or stabbing the king; that he himself had been commissioned to carry several letters for this end; that a bet of a hundred pounds had been made by several Jesuits in regard to the death of Charles the Second, some maintaining that the prince would not be in existence at the festival of Christmas; others maintaining that he could not be assassinated until after that period. He revealed also that the Catholics had planned to set fire to the four corners of London, and to do the same in the principal cities of the three kingdoms; that at a given signal, twenty thousand men were to leave Flanders, disembark in England, penetrate to London, and rain fire balls on the people, which they called the piquant pills of Tewksbury; that a general rising had been concerted in Ireland, and that, finally, the crown was to be solemnly offered to the duke of York, because they were assured he would not hesitate to take an oath to extirpate the protestant religion.

Several Jesuits denounced, by oaths, were arrested at once; Coleman, who had at first concealed himself, then surrendered himself to the secretary of state, and presented himself boldly before the magistrate, as if the high protection of the duke of York could guarantee him from every danger. The investigations of justice, however, took their course; Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, who had been commissioned to take informations on this dark affair, acquitted himself of his duty with great zeal, made requisitions for all suspected persons, and seized them. Finally, he accidentally laid his hands upon a correspondence of the queen, the duke of York, and several Catholic lords, with the nuncio of the pope, who was residing at Brussels, and with the confessor of Louis the Fourteenth. As he was about to use these important letters, the court rid itself of him. His dead body was found one morning in a ditch near Primrose Hill, on the road from Hampstead, transfixed with his own sword, the whole of it in the wound, and presenting the singular circumstance that not a drop of blood had flowed from this horrid sore. It was suspected that his assassins had passed his sword through his body after he was dead, in order to create the suspicion of suicide; and this opinion was corroborated when they took off the dress of the victim, and discovered a livid and blueish mark around his neck, which proved that he had been strangled. The crime was evident; it remained to discover the guilty. William Bedloe, a captain of cavalry, one of the trusty friends of the papists, appeared before the council of inquiry, and made revelations. He declared that on the eve of the discovery of the dead body, he had been sent for to Somerset House, where Queen Catherine resided, where they showed him the unfortunate Godfrey lying strangled in a lower chamber of the palace, and that a domestic of Lord Bellasis had offered him four thousand pounds to carry it off.

The guilt of the queen was evident; the house of commons thought of accusing her; the lords alone rejected, with all their might, the scandal of a judgment against the wife of their sovereign; Charles the Second was, however, compelled, in order to give satisfaction to public opinion, which began to threaten, to allow the trial of Coleman to proceed, and to join with him the priests Ireland, Pickering, and Gove; they were all four condemned to death, and sacrificed to the safety of the monarch. All, however, was not over in this matter. A goldsmith, named Miles Prance, a Roman Catholic, who had been denounced by Bedloe as one of the accomplices in the murder of Godfrey, indignant at seeing that the court permitted those who had obeyed its orders to be executed, made revelations in his turn; he declared that the crime had been committed in Somerset House, by Gerard and Kelly, Irish priests, assisted by Horace Hill, a lackey of the queen, Robert Green, who was employed in her chapel, and Henry Berry, a Swiss of the palace. All were tried, attainted and convicted of the assassination, and condemned to capital punishment. The provincial of the Jesuits, Whitebread, Fathers Fenwick, Gaven, Turner, and Harcourt, who were involved in the principal accusation, underwent the same punishment; George Wakeman the physician of the queen, was alone saved by the interference of Charles the Second himself, without any one having ever known what motive induced the monarch to use clemency towards a man who wished to poison him. The marquis of Strafford was also condemned as guilty of high treason, and condemned to be hung and quartered; by way of commutation, he had his head cut off. Finally, the parliament having inflicted judgment on all these wretches, talked of attacking the great culprits, and of bringing the duke of York and Queen Catherine of Portugal to judgment.

The king, who feared the consequences of such a proceeding, determined to dissolve the house of commons, which had been in existence for seventeen years, and to order new elections, hoping that it would be easy to corrupt the new delegates and to put an end to the prosecutions against those who had embarked in the plot of the papists. He judged illy; the members sent to the new parliament proved to be as incorruptible as their predecessors; they continued the inquiry commenced against the duke of York, passed a bill which excluded that prince from the throne of Great Britain, and decreed that in default of a direct heir, the king abdicating or dying, without children, the crown should devolve on the person whom the nation should judge most worthy of it. Parliament did not confine itself to this act of vigour; it passed the celebrated law called the habeas corpus act, which placed bounds on the power of the king, and took from him the right of imprisoning or hanging a citizen by the mere act of his will.

The duke of York, seeing the turn which things were taking, determined to retire to Scotland in order to tranquillize the fears of the English nation, and to attach the Scotch to his cause. The departure of the prince from the city of London gave birth to manifesta tions extremely disagreeable to him; his carriage was accompanied by the hootings of the populace, and his people were chased with stones.

On the other hand, public opinion declared for the duke of Monmouth, the natural son of Charles the Second. Two parties were now formed in England, the Whigs and the Tories; the former declared themselves to be the defenders of the national liberties; they received the name Whigs from an appellation by which the Presbyterians of Scotland were designated. The Tories, the partizans of royalty, maintained the privileges of the noble castes; they took their name from an English word which was used to designate a band of Irish robbers.

The struggle between these two parties became daily more lively and animated. The king determined to dissolve parliament a second time, and to convene a new house of commons in the city of Oxford. This new effort succeeded no better with Charles the Second than the preceding one had done. The members of the assembly opened their sitting amid cries of "No papacy! no slavery!" and that, notwithstanding the presence of the royal troops which guarded the approaches to the hall in which the deputies were.

The new house was still engaged with the interminable business of the popish plot. An Irishman named Fitz Harris made revelations of a new plot still more frightful than any of those which had been discovered, and offered to furnish proof that the duke of York and Queen Catherine had ordered the death of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, and had presided over the accomplishment of the crime.

Charles the Second, who had the same interests as his brother and wife in not awakening public attention to this matter, and who feared lest the parliament should attack him personally, hastened to have a warrant issued by the house of lords authorising the arrest of Fitz Harris. The house of commons claimed the prisoner; declared that the cause should be tried at its bar; that if he had calumniated any one, it was right that the justification should be public; but that if the revelations of the accused were sustained by irrefutable proofs, it was necessary that the guilty should receive the punishment of their crime, and that the house of commons should attain them, even on the very steps of the throne.

This energetic declaration showed that the deputies would push the investigations to the utmost. Charles the Second dared not expose himself to the chances of the proceeding, and to put an end to the dispute he dissolved parliament, and determined never to convene another. From that moment he governed with despotic power, and, throwing off the mask, appeared in his true character—unjust, debauched, greedy, and cruel; he was always surrounded by spies and satellites; he took from the Presbyterians their offices and employments, and openly favoured the Episcopalians and Catholics, and deprived of its charter the city of London, which had been for a long time at the head of the popular party.

Scotland was not treated better than England; the king sent troops into that country to bring the Presbyterians to reason. He enjoined on the inhabitants to give neither quarters nor food, nor a place of refuge to the non-conformist ministers or their partizans, and authorised the soldiers to pursue them to extremities, and to exterminate them to the last man. All the corporations and cities were forced to surrender their charters to Charles the Second; and those who preserved some privileges had to pay for them with weights of gold. For two years the nation appeared to be plunged in apathy; at last some courageous men determined to make an appeal to the national sentiment, to foment a revolution, and hurl Charles Stuart from the throne. The leaders of the conspiracy were the duke of Monmouth, Lord Russel, the two republicans Essex and Algernon Sidney; an honourable citizen named John Hampden; Colonel Ramsay, an old republican officer; Lieutenant-colonel Wolcot, who held the same opinions; the under sheriff of London, Goodenough; Ferguson, a fiery Presbyterian; several lawyers and some rich merchants of the city. Unfortunately they were sold by a wretch named Reeling, and all paid with their heads for their generous devotion to their country, except Monmouth and Hampden, who were both banished.

Shortly afterwards, the king perceived himself attacked by a strange sickness which the physicians attributed to the effects of poison, and which had the character of an apoplectic attack. Public opinion accused the queen and the duke of York of this new crime. He languished for a week, and died on the 6th of February, 1685, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fifth of his reign.

In France the religious reaction was felt more violently than even in England. The infamous Louis the Fourteenth, at the instigation of his confessor, Father la Chaise, and of Maintenon, his mistress, persecuted the protestants, excluded them from all the liberal professions, destroyed their churches, imprisoned their ministers, and compelled them to bring their children to the church and to subscribe a Catholic formula for them and their wives.

Rather than submit to these tyrannical and vexatious measures, a large number of the reformed determined to leave France; but the great king, who was not desirous of losing a part of his revenues, put a stop to this plan, garnished the frontiers with soldiers, and drove back the emigrants with blows, into the interior of the kingdom. Those Huguenots who dared to protest against this abuse of power were merely sent to the galleys of the king to serve the gracious monarch for the rest of their lives.

So much injustice finally exasperated their minds; the protestants of the southern provinces took up arms, and claimed the liberties and franchises guaranteed to them by the edict of Nantz. Louis the Fourteenth replied to their just demands by inundating the country with dragoons and missionaries, the one commissioned to exterminate, the others to convert. Frightful massacres were organized in all the southern provinces, and the cities became the theatres of bloody executions, which recalled the atrocities of the St. Bartholomew. But these religious and military expeditions not producing the result which his majesty expected, the radical extirpation of Catholicism, the king ordered the bishops to assemble and bring a complaint before his throne against the obstinacy of the heretics, who had the audacity to wish to be neither converted nor murdered. As a consequence of the representations of his clergy, Louis the Fourteenth made the famous decree called the revocation of the edict of Nantz. The monarch declared all that had been done in the kingdom in favour of the reformed religion abolished for ever; he ordered the demolition of all the protestant temples that were still standing; he expressly prohibited the Huguenots from assembling in any public or private place; and he commanded all their ministers who refused to abjure their belief, to leave the kingdom in fifteen days after the publication of the edict.

Whilst excluding the preachers, his majesty prohibited the faithful from following their pastors, and from transporting out of France either their property or persons, under the penalty of the galleys for men, and the confiscation of their persons as well as property for females. "Notwithstanding the dangers they incurred of being arrested on the frontier, more than eight hundred thousand Huguenots," says the marquis de la Fare, "succeeded in emigrating, and of carrying into a foreign country their money and most precious objects. This was the more baneful for the country, since, independently of the capital which they took away from commerce, the land remained uncultivated in many parts of the country, in consequence of the departure of these intelligent and laborious men."

Although his holiness was at open war with the great king on the subject of the regale, he sent to him a letter of congratulations on the act of infamy he had accomplished, in revoking the edict of Nantz, which encouraged Louis the Fourteenth to persevere in this deplorable path. His majesty was soon not content with the execrable glory he had acquired of murdering his own subjects, he wished to hear of massacres in the states of his neighbours, and compelled Victor Amadeus, duke of Savoy, to exterminate the inhabitants of the valleys of Lucerne, La Perouse, and St. Martin, commonly called the Vaudois, who professed the doctrines of Calvin.

The Piedmontese troops, united with the dragoons of the king of France, enveloped all the country and massacred more than twenty thousand Huguenots in the defiles of the mountains.

Louis the Fourteenth was not the only prince who had declared himself the champion of Catholicism; the duke of York, having become king of England in defiance of the decree of parliament which excluded him from the throne, laboured openly to bring back Great Britain into the bosom of the church, and affected to go every Sunday to the chapel of his palace, clothed in the insignia of royalty, to assist at mass. He did more, he sent an ambassador to the court of Rome to demand officially from the holy father if he would receive the obedience of the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He then published an edict of conscience, and abolished, of his own authority, the laws which had been before promulgated by parliament against the Catholics.

By his orders, Titus Oates, the Jesuit, who, during the reign of Charles the Second, had betrayed his companions and discovered the conspiracy of the papists, was arrested, thrown into prison, condemned as a perjurer to be whipped by the executioner, during the passage from Aldgate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn, to be imprisoned for life, to stand in the pillory five times a year, and to pay a fine of twenty thousand marks of silver. This vengeance on a former accomplice served as a prelude to the bloody executions of which the Presbyterians were the victims.

The nation, which held in horror all that resembled papacy, then allowed its hatred for the king to break out, and appeared disposed to break the yoke. The duke of Monmouth, who since the last conspiracy had lived in retirement in Holland, partook of the general indignation, and determined to devote himself to wrest the crown from the brow of James the Second. He sent the earl of Argyle to Scotland to raise the country, whilst he himself prepared to make a descent on England. Argyle was unfortunately attacked by the royal troops before he had collected together more than two thousand men; he was defeated, taken prisoner, judged by a military commission, and beheaded on the public square of Edinburg. This check did not prevent Monmouth from throwing himself into the county of Dorset, at the head of his partizans. The popularity of his name was so great, and the hatred for the king such, that four days after his arrival his small troop was reinforced by three thousand men; he marched immediately on the city of Taunton, where reinforcements awaited him. There he took the title of king; but instead of using his time advantageously, and marching rapidly on London, he erred by remaining in those parts to receive puerile honours.

James the Second assembled troops in great haste, and sent them under the command of the earl of Feversham and Churchill to stop the progress of the rebels. The two armies met at Sedgemoor, near Bridgewater. Monmouth, inspired by his high courage, wished to deserve the throne or lose his life in the first battle. At the head of a chosen troop he vigorously charged the royal ininfantry, threw its ranks into disorder, was bearing it down, and every thing was pre-saging victory to him, when his cavalry, commanded by Lord Grey, either from cowardice or treason on the part of its leader, fled at the first attack, and left the field of battle. Monmouth saw in a moment his lines outflanked by his enemies, who charged from all sides at once; he did not, however, give way until after a bloody combat of three hours. He fled more than twenty miles without stopping and almost alone; finally, his horse having fallen beneath him, he continued his way on foot, followed only by a German count. At night they slept on the ground, exhausted by hunger and fatigue, and covered themselves in the grass. On the next day they were discovered by their pursuers; the duke was arrested and conducted into the presence of James the Second, who wished to feast his eyes with the sight of a conquered enemy. He was then judged and condemned to death.

The day of the punishment having arrived, the intrepid Monmouth was led to the place where he was to be executed. During the passage he did not exhibit the slightest sign of alarm, and when he arrived at the foot of the scaffold he only besought the executioner to measure his blow well, so that he would not be obliged to strike twice, as had happened to Lord Russell. This recommendation produced so painful a sensation in the executioner, that he felt all his strength abandon him; he raised his axe, but his arm was so weak that the axe struck an uncertain blow, and only entered half an inch into his flesh. The duke raised his head and turned to him as if he would have reproached his want of skill, he then replaced it on the block; the executioner gave him two other blows, which only inflicted on him two new wounds; then, being beside himself, he cast down his axe to the ground and wished to fly, but the sheriff stopped him and compelled him to finish his ministerial duties; finally, two more blows separated the head from the trunk.

Terrible as had been the death of the young duke of Monmouth, it was not enough for the vengeance of the sanguinary James. After the leader came the turn of the soldiers, and all the rebels who had been made prisoners were pitilessly murdered. Colonel Kirke, the worthy slave of such a master, executed the royal will with incredible barbarity. This monster, joining irony to the most atrocious cruelty, massacred two hundred of these unfortunate men in a festive hall, whilst he was gorging himself with food and wine; as the victims were writhing in the convulsions of death, he said that the rebels appeared to be in a humour to dance, and ordered the trumpets of the regiment to play in honour of the king. This same Kirke dared to propose to a beautiful young girl who asked the pardon of her brother from him, to buy it at the price of her honour, and when the unfortunate child had consented to this infamous bargain, and accomplished her frightful sacrifice, he opened a window and showed her the dead body of her brother hanging to a gibbet.

The military executions not proceeding fast enough for the impatient James the Second, he added a judicial commission to them, under the presidency of a hot Catholic named Jeffries. It is computed that this tribunal of blood tortured, burned, or beheaded, in one month, more victims than the troops of the king had murdered during the whole campaign. As a recompense for the zeal which the president of the commission had shown in the service of royalty, James made Jeffries the Catholic, Jeffries the executioner, a peer, declared him worthy to sit in the capacity of chancellor among those lords, the descendants of robbers and assassins, who composed the upper chamber, that scourge of England, the execration of the people and the shame of the human race.

From that moment it became evident to all, that James the Second wished to establish the papacy in Great Britain by violent means; courtiers openly abjured protestantism; the Jesuits built colleges in the provinces, bishops were consecrated in the royal chapel, in accordance with the ritual of the Roman church, and styled themselves apostolic vicars; from all quarters legions of priests and monks came in, and to see their audacity, it would really appear as if they came to take possession of England as of a conquered country. Before the danger to which the political and religious liberties of Great Britain were exposed, all parties ceased their quarrels and united against the common enemy; Whigs and Tories, Presbyterians and churchmen, concentrated all their hatred on the person of the king, and fomented a revolution, which led to the expulsion of the fanatical James the Second, and to the elevation of William of Orange, the stadtholder of the United Provinces, to the throne, by the name of William the Third.

This news affected the old pope very slightly; besides, his holiness not having any religious belief, it mattered little to him whether the Jesuits or the church of England men triumphed, since in no case would bring any profit to the Holy See, the one not being more disposed than the other to divide the treasures of Great Britain with him.

We should say, however, as an excuse for the indifference of Innocent the Eleventh, on the subject of the affairs of the church, that he was very much occupied in publishing sumptuary laws at Rome, and that all his attention was absorbed by the struggle in which he was engaged with a new sect of heretics, who threatened to pervert all Italy. The principal supporter of the heresy was a Spanish priest, named Michael Molinos, who had published several works, amongst others the Spiritual Guide, in which the maxims of the ancient and modern mystics were openly extolled, in order to lead the faithful into "the inner way," that is to say, into a state which consisted in thinking no longer of the material part of his being, so as to identify himself with God. According to the Spanish priest, when one wished to enter into communion with God, he must abandon himself entirely to the Holy Spirit, annihilate himself before it, and not operate actively, neither in thought nor actions. He maintained that this annihilation of the moral faculties, was the return of the human soul toward its source, and the only means of communicating with the All Powerful; he affirmed that as soon as one was enabled to lose himself in the Divinity, he was really in "the inner way."

Molinos prohibited those who had attained to this state of quietude, from thinking either of future penalties or recompenses, of paradise or hell, of death or eternity; he was unwilling that the soul should preserve the recollection either of itself or of God. He added, that contemplation, consisting in remaining in one faith and a general adoration, it mattered little whether impure ideas were presented to the mind, that we should neither nourish nor reject them, but tolerate them with patience, so as not to depart from the state of quietude, which is nothing else than the most absolute resignation to the divine will; that if God permitted that the devil should use their bodies, in order to accomplish carnal actions with persons of the same sex, or of a different sex, they should be careful how they opposed Satan.

These singular doctrines concerning quietism were propagated rapidly, and found numerous adepts in France; Father Guillore wrote, amongst other extravagancies, "That blindness, the most profound and deep, insensibility, the hardest and most remote from all consolation, was the most holy situation in which the soul could be."

In another passage of his works he said, "That if God permitted the devil to seize on the body as well as on the imagination and the mind, we should permit him to lead us into all kinds of abominations; that the more horrible and confounding the temptation was, the more sublime was the abandonment; that the more impossible it was to save the purity of the soul and the chastity of the body, the more should we sink into prostration."

Innocent the Eleventh fulminated bulls of anathema against the Italian and French Quietists; he declared their doctrines to be heretical, suspicious, erroneous, outrageous, rash, blasphemous, tending to the entire relaxation and overthrow of the ecclesiastical discipline. But neither could the censures of the pontiff, nor the severities he displayed against Molinos and his adherents, arrest the progress of quietism, which gradually invaded the convents of men and women, and counted among its partizans a great number of abbots and the noblest ladies of the court, its doctrines favouring their tastes for debauchery.

His holiness did not otherwise disturb himself about quietism, and gave his attention to a subject to which he attached great importance, the abolition of the franchises of the ambassadors. The pope took advantage of the death of Marshal d'Estrées, the minister plenipotentiary of Louis the Fourteenth, at his court, to seize on the palace of the embassy, and to decree that there no longer existed a French quarter in Rome. This step, to which most of the powers submitted, exasperated the imperious Louis the Fourteenth, who thought he saw in it an attempt on his dignity; he wrote at once to the holy father, that he demanded that things should be replaced on their former footing. Innocent was unwilling to revise his decision, and maintained, with reason, that the ambassadors abused their privileges in introducing merchandise and defrauding the apostolic treasury of its dues, and in giving an asylum to criminals in their palaces, and in bargaining with them for their protection.

Notwithstanding the wise representations of the pope, Louis the Fourteenth continued to demand the maintenance of the privileges which his ambassadors had enjoyed, and immediately sent the marquis Lavardin to take the post of the marshal d'Estrées at Rome, being careful to have him accompanied by eight hundred armed men. The latter presented himself at the gates of the holy city, accompanied by his formidable escort and his baggage, which was borne by fifty mules. On the remark of the officers of the customs that he could not enter until he had submitted to an examination, he replied insolently, that he would cut off the ears of the first man who was bold enough to lay hands upon the baggage which belonged to the ambassador of the king of France, and he made his entrance so well sustained by his cavalry, that it became impossible for the soldiers of the pope to dispute the right of asylum with him, not only for the palace of the embassy, but also for the adjacent streets. He placed guards at all the avenues of the quarter, with orders to fire on the troops of the Holy See, if they dared to approach his palace; on the next day he sent, by way of derision, to demand an audience of his holiness. Instead of admitting him into his presence, Innocent the Eleventh fulminated a terrible anathema against him; the marquis of Lavardin, as if to brave him, immediately went to the church of St. Louis, caused divine service to be celebrated in his presence, and solemnly communed.

Louis the Fourteenth did not content himself with approving of the conduct of his ambassador, he wished then to attack the pope in the exercise of his spiritual power. He declared, by an edict, that the bulls published in France by the court of Rome, concerning the franchises, were null and abusive; he caused the parliament of Paris to decree that a general council should be convened to judge Innocent the Eleventh; and the advocate general Talon, before the assembled great chamber and criminal court, in the name of all the subjects of the king, accused the pope of troubling Christendom, and declared that, Innocent not putting the concordat into execution, they were no longer obliged to conform to it in France.

"And, oh, strange thing," added the advocate general, "the head of the church, whose chief care it should be to preserve the integrity of the faith, has not ceased, since he has been seated on the chair of St. Peter, to carry on intercourse with dangerous men, who have declared themselves the disciples of Jansenius, and whose doctrines his predecessors have condemned; he loads them with favours, he has openly praised them, he has declared himself their protector, even against kings; and this faction, which is subversive of all political and religious authority, which has not forgotten how, during thirty years, to sap slyly all spiritual and temporal powers which were not favourable to it, which wishes to substitute a republic for the throne, freedom of thought for the Christian faith, erect altars to the pope, because he sustains and foment the cabals. What would have become of the peace of the church, if the foresight and indefatigable cares of the great king, to whom he even gave birth, to be the defender and buckler of religion, had not stricken the heretics with the sword of his justice? A singular spectacle, given to the world by a prince whose piety, intelligence, and faith render him infallible, when the pontiff of Rome, the successor of the apostle, precipitates himself into the abyss of error. Thus, France, Europe, the Christian world, beseech by my mouth, the oldest son of the church, the descendant of St. Louis, to save the belief of our fathers, by using his power, not only to maintain the franchises in their full extent, but also to put an end to the disorders which the vacancy of the bishoprics in the kingdom produces, to prohibit his subjects from sending any money to the court of Rome, and to overthrow the unworthy priest who soils the pontifical throne by his abominations." Louis the Fourteenth, who had thus decreed himself to be the supreme arbiter in his difference with Innocent the Eleventh, did not hesitate to follow the injunctions of the advocate general; he first seized on Avignon, confined the cardinal Rannucci, the apostolic nuncio at St. Oleron, and announced that he was about to appoint Monseigneur de Harley, archbishop of Paris, patriarch of France.

Although these threats were of a nature to inspire serious fears in the sovereign pontiff, he still persisted in his resistance, and was unwilling to listen to any arrangement, or any concession. If we should seek on what assistance he relied in daring to enter upon a strife with the most powerful monarch of Christendom, we will find that it was not on the hope of producing a reaction by his censures, nor on the authority of his apostolic power, nor on the zeal of Catholic princes for the interest of religion, but upon that general hatred which was beginning to be felt towards Louis the Fourteenth, and which was to be so fatal to France. Still, Innocent the Eleventh had not the satisfaction of seeing the defeat of his enemy; he died on the 12th of August, 1689, broken down by old age, and worn out by sickness.

ALEXANDER THE EIGHTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINTH POPE.

[A. D. 1689.]

Louis the Fourteenth purchases the suffrages of the cardinals, and causes the Venetian Peter Ottoboni, to be chosen pope—Indolence of the sovereign pontiff—His prodigality to the members of his family—Bull of the pope against the philosophical sin—Restitution of Avignon—Death of Alexander the Eighth.

AFTER the death of Innocent the Eleventh, the duke de Chaumes, the French ambassador, who had been sent by Louis the Fourteenth to replace the marquis Lavardin, distributed more than three millions among the cardinal electors, and induced them to choose as pope, the Venetian Peter Ottoboni, one of the creatures of the monarch.

The new pontiff took the name of Alexander the Eighth; the authors of his time agree in saying that he was of an easy character, that he had agreeable manners, and that his only fault consisted in loving the table too much; rigourists reproach him with passing his nights in drinking, singing love songs of his own composition, and discoursing upon the excellence of atheism.

The first use which he made of his omnipotence, was to appoint his great nephew Ottoboni, cardinal padrone, who, it is maintained, was his bastard and minion; he gave him also the superintendence of the affairs of the church, the dignity of grand chancellor, and legate of Avignon, and conferred on him benefices which produced an annual revenue of one hundred and fifty thousand crowns.

After having enriched his grand nephew, the pope thought of the other members of his family, and distributed among them several millions which remained in the apostolic treasury on the death of Innocent the Eleventh. Antonio Ottoboni, his nephew, received for his share five hundred thousand crowns and the post of generalissimo of the troops of the church; he gave to his other nephew, Don Marco, a like sum, with the title of general of the galleys and duke of Fiano, which enabled him to marry a rich heiress of the Colonna family. Finally, he behaved so generously to the children of his brothers and sisters, than in less than three weeks, he had emptied the treasury, exhausted the list of benefices, and loaded the Holy See with enormous engagements. A cardinal wished to remonstrate with him on the subject of his prodigalities, and to induce him to set bounds to his nepotism; but Alexander imposed silence on him and replied, alluding to his great age, "I have no time to lose; only twenty-three hours and a half remain for me."

During all his reign the holy father was occupied exclusively with enriching his family, and heaping honours on the cardinal padrone, his favourite. He showed the most perfect indifference for the affairs of the church, and the only acts which marked his passage across the chair of the apostle, were, first, a constitution against Jansenism, and the partizans of that doctrine, in which, according to Ligny, he gave an evident mark of his fallibility, by condemning the five propositions in the sense of Jansenius, for he attacked St. Augustine himself, and proved that the theories of that father concerning grace were the same as those of Port Royal. Doctor Gilbert also wrote on this subject: "We must separate the evangelical doctrine concerning the grace of Christ from the opinions of the head of the church, since Alexander the Eighth, by his constitution, has inflicted a wound on himself, of which the sore can never perhaps be cicatrized." He then published two bulls, the one concerning "Philosophical Sin," which was a thesis taught by the Jesuits, and which consisted in maintaining, "that man can commit condemnable actions without offending God, if he has no knowledge of the Divinity, or if he did not think of God whilst he was doing them." The second decretal of his holiness was in regard to the famous protest of Innocent the Eleventh on the regale. It was as follows:

"Wishing to walk in the footsteps of Innocent the Eleventh, our predecessor of blessed memory, who disapproved of, annulled, and erased all that had been done in the matter of the regale, with all its consequences; wishing, moreover, to regard as well specified here the acts emanating from the assembly of 1682, as well in all that concerns the extension of the right of regale, as in that which touches the declaration concerning ecclesiastical power and the mandates, arrests, decrees, edicts, and ordinances of the clergy, the parliament and the king of France, we declare, after mature deliberation, and by virtue of the plenitude of our apostolic power, that all those things, and each of them, which have been done touching the extension of the right of regale, the declaration concerning the ecclesiastical power and four propositions that it contains, have been, are, and shall be of full right null, invalid, illusory, fully and entirely destitute of force and effect; that no one is bound to observe them, even though he may have taken an oath to do so; finally, we declare that they should be regarded as not in being, as never having existed, and we protest before God, against them of their nullity."

Alexander the Eighth dared not, however, promulgate this bull of anathema against the four propositions of the French clergy; he imitated the prudent reserve of one of his predecessors, shut up his protest in the archives of the Vatican, and put off the publication of it to a more favourable time. His hypocrisy succeeded admirably. The great king attributed the moderation of the pontiff to his gratitude, and to give him a brilliant proof of his satisfaction, restored to him Avignon and the Venaissin county.

Louis the Fourteenth was not long in repenting that he had made this restitution, for a few days afterwards he learned that the pope, on his death bed, had lanced a terrible bull against the regale. His holiness, Alexander the Eighth, died on the 30th of January, 1691.

INNOCENT THE TWELFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1691.]

Vacancy in the Holy See—Election of Innocent the Twelfth—He publishes a bull against nepotism—Policy of the new pontiff—His holiness wishes to humble the pride of Louis the Fourteenth—The devout monarch submits to the Holy See—Cowardice of Louis the Fourteenth—Quarrel about quietism between Fenelon and Bossuet—History of Madame de la Mothe Guyon—Her singular doctrines—Her mystic loves—Bossuet causes this singular woman to be condemned—Bull against the book of "The Maxims of the Saints"—Fenelon is declared a heretic—Partiality of Louis the Fourteenth in the quarrel between Bossuet and Fenelon—The secular jubilee—Death of the pontiff—Reflections on the history of the church during the seventeenth century.

SUCH a division was manifested among the cardinals who were called upon to give a successor to the pontiff Alexander the Eighth, that for six entire months it was impossible for one of the competitors for the chair of St. Peter to obtain a majority; at last, thanks to the millions of France, Antonio Pignatelli carried it over his rivals. Louis the Fourteenth, notwithstanding the deception he had experienced in the case of Alexander the Eighth, persisted in his plan of wishing for a pontiff devoted to his interests, and spent as much as fifteen millions in purchasing the votes of the cardinals, and in inducing them to choose as pope, by the name of Innocent the Twelfth, Antonio Pignatelli, a wary, supple, and persevering old man, who had promised the French ambassador to approve of the regale without restrictions.

The holy father was originally from Naples, and sprung from an ancient family in farther Calabria; he had been successively vice legate of the duchy of Urbino, inquisitor of Malta, governor of Viterba, nuncio at Florence, in Poland, and at Vienna, secretary to the congregation of bishops, master of the household to Clement the Tenth, bishop of Faenza, legate of Bologna, metropolitan of Naples, and cardinal.

In the exercise of these different offices he had acquired a great experience in the government of the church, and had discovered that by abandoning the interests of the Holy See, to occupy themselves only with those of their families, the pontiffs had themselves sapped the bases on which the edifice of the papacy rested. He then determined to follow an entirely different system of conduct; he declared that he would extirpate the frightful nepotism which had outraged the people, and ruined the church for more than two centuries; he made all the members of the sacred college subscribe to a bull which took away all extraordinary distinctions from the nephews of popes, making it obligatory on cardinals, present and future, to confirm it by an oath at each new conclave, and on all the pontiffs to do the same.

In order to fortify, by example, the rule which he had prescribed, he gave neither benefice nor dignity to his relatives, who were numerous, and even prohibited them from coming to Rome. He made ordinances to reform the expenses of the apostolic chamber, and pushed his domestic economy so far as to prohibit his steward from spending more than a tester at his repast. He suppressed useless offices, as well as the pensions with which his predecessors had loaded the treasury, and which amounted to the enormous sum of two hundred millions of crowns.

After having introduced order into the civil administration, Innocent the Twelfth wished to make reforms in the organization of the regular and secular clergy; but there he met with such resistance, that he dared not touch the ancient order of things, and was constrained to leave his work of political and religious regeneration incomplete. All his efforts, all his perseverance, were foiled by the obstinacy of the religious congregations, and he was obliged to tolerate, as of old, the irregularities of monks and nuns, and the shameful disorders of the princes of the church and the Roman ecclesiastics.

In his political controversies with foreign powers, he was more successful than in his endeavours with the monks; notwithstanding the promises which he had made to Louis the Fourteenth concerning the regale, he knew how to induce that proud monarch to restore to him his promise, and to submit to his wishes. The skilful pontiff used, to secure his ends, Father la Chaise, the confessor of the king, and Maintenon, who was united by a secret marriage to Louis the Fourteenth. Both inspired the royal devotee with religious terrors on the subject of the regale, and obtained from him an edict, which enjoined on the ecclesiastics of the kingdom to send to the court of Rome a retraction of the decisions which they had made by his order, and induced them to declare, in testimony of their repentance, that they regarded their own decrees as null and culpable, and that they swore a passive and absolute obedience to the Holy See. As his share, the cowardly despot wrote the following letter:

"Most holy father, I experience a great joy, in seeing all that your holiness has accomplished for the good of the church, and the advancement of our most holy religion, which redoubles my filial respect for your person; thus I seek to inform you, by the strongest proofs I can give, how sincere is my submission to the Holy See. I have published the necessary decrees, to prevent the things contained in my edict of 1682, touching the declaration made by the clergy of France, from being observed for the future. I desire, that not only may your holiness be informed of my docility to your orders, but that all Europe may know, by this brilliant mark of my submission, how much I venerate your great qualities. I do not doubt that your beatitude responds to the affection I bear to you, by every demonstration of your paternal pity; and that God may preserve your holiness many happy years, is the wish, most holy father, of your most devoted son, Louis, fourteenth of the name, king of France and Navarre."

If this letter were not entirely from the hand of Louis the Fourteenth, we might think that it was written by Tartufo, under the dictation of Escobar, so shamelessly does the great king sport with truth, good faith, and reason.

Thus terminated the affair of the regale, for which France had been in incessant hostilities with the Holy See for eleven years.

As soon as Innocent the Twelfth had obtained this triumph, he detached himself at once from the league formed against France, and broke abruptly with the empire and Spain; he even protested against the investitures of some fiefs comprised in the states of the church, which had been conferred by Leopold, and published through the camerlingue* a decree, in which he declared, by virtue of the plenitude of his power, that the revenues of the fiefs included in the provinces of the Holy See, should be reunited to the apostolic treasury. The ambassadors, Martiniz and Lambert, protested in vain against this abuse of power; the pope persisted in his pretensions, and separated violently from his old ally, leading into his defection some princes of Italy and the duke of Savoy.

* A high officer of the Roman court.

Some historians give it as an opinion, that the sovereign pontiff, in joining the party of France, did not follow his own judgment, but that of the Jesuits; that he yielded in this to the fears which the good fathers inspired in him concerning his existence. They produce, in support of this assertion, the bulls which the holy father fulminated against Jansenism, and especially against the disciples of Anthony Arnaud.

This celebrated doctor, after having for a long time combatted the despotism of kings, the absolutism of popes, and the corrupting morality of the Jesuits, had taken refuge in the Low Countries, to escape from the tyranny of Louis the Fourteenth; and he, whose nephew had been a minister of state, and who had himself refused to be a cardinal, lived in an obscure retreat, without fortune and without servants. He had to console him in his exile only Nicholas, one of his old companions at Port Royal, to whom he made this beautiful reply, when the latter was discouraged, and sought to persuade him that it was time for them to take some repose. "We repose! when mankind is suffering! and shall we not have all eternity in which to repose?" This formidable adversary of the oppressors of the people remained in the breach until the last. His great soul sustained him in the midst of trials and adversities, gave an extraordinary vigour to a body apparently weak and delicate, and permitted him to continue his admirable labours unto extreme old age.

"Finally, after a career so stormy and unfortunate," says Voltaire, "according to the ideas of those who place misfortune in exile and poverty, without considering the glory, the friends, and the active old age, which were the lot of this famous man," Arnaud saw death approaching without alarm and weakness, and he expired in the arms of Father Quesnel, at Brussels, on the 8th of August, 1694, aged eighty-three years. He was buried in the sanctuary of the church of St. Catherine.

As nothing about so extraordinary a man can be matter of indifference, we transcribe a portrait which one of his disciples has left us of him. "The exterior of Arnaud," says he, "was not prepossessing; he was short, and his head was of a disproportionate size; his countenance would even have announced stupidity, had it not been for the brightness of his eyes, which revealed the fire of his genius. This doctor, so terrible with his pen in his hand, was the best of men among his intimates and in the world, whither he carried simple and mild manners. His conversation was grave and reflective, without excluding a proper gaiety; his memory was prodigious, and furnished him always, at the proper moment, with the most striking passages that authors had used on the subject of the conversation. He thoroughly understood the Latin poets; he was not only profound in theology, in the knowledge of scripture, in ecclesiastical science, but he was also versed in dialectics, geometry, grammar, and rhetoric. He wrote about one hundred volumes in different forms, of which several were done in connection with Pascal, Nicholas, and Lamy, besides the correspondence which he carried on all his life with the learned in Italy, Germany, and France. The place of his burial was for a long time unknown, but his heart was carried to Port Royal, and from thence to Palaiseau. The most illustrious poets made epitaphs on him; and Boileau was not afraid to displease Louis the Fourteenth, by consecrating verses to the memory of the great Arnaud. His death took from the partizans of Jansenius the most skillful defender they ever had, and the Jesuits were freed from the most formidable of their adversaries.

The bulls of Innocent the Twelfth came in very good season to revive the old quarrels of the Molinists and Jansenists, and to assure the triumph of the Jesuits. Very fortunately the censures did not produce a great effect upon the minds of men, the attention being then captivated by the reappearance of quietism, and the discussions between the celebrated Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray, and the illustrious Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, who had declared themselves to be, the one the defender, the other the persecutor of, the new doctrines concerning pure love.

Among its most ardent propagators, this sect counted a Barnabite monk, called Father Lacombe and a young woman, his penitent, named Jeanne Bouvier de la Mothe Guyon. This woman, who has become celebrated as much for the singularity of her life, as for the strangeness of her doctrines, was the daughter of Claude Bouvier, the lord of la Mothe-Vergonville, the master of requests. Her parents placed her, when very young, in a convent of Montargis to be educated, and took her from it when twelve years old. Having become a young girl, Jeanne showed an irresistible desire for an ascetic life, and was desirous of becoming a nun of the Visitation. Her father strongly opposed this plan, and seeing no other means of combatting the exaltation of his daughter but marriage, he married her to a rich inhabitant of the province named Jacques Guyon.

From this union five children were born in twelve years. Jeanne Guyon was about to give birth to a daughter, who was afterwards duchess of Sully, when her husband died. She was then twenty-eight years old, beautiful, rich, full of grace, and spirit. It was then that she entered, by letter, into intercourse with Father Lacombe, the Barnabite monk, whose convent was situated near to Thonon, in the Chablais, and whom she had before seen at Paris. She confided to him her most secret thoughts, and asked his advice for the direction of her conscience. Two days afterwards the Barnabite replied to her, that he had prayed to obtain from God a perfect knowledge of the mysteries of her ardent soul. That Jesus Christ had appeared to him, and revealed to him that he destined her for an extraordinary ministry.

Jeanne Guyon wished to place herself at once in a condition to fulfil this holy mission to which God called her. She chose preceptors for her children; abandoned her guardianship, which was of great consequence; only reserved a moderate pension from her own property, and came to place her heart and her existence at the disposal of Father Lacombe, to be used by him according to the designs of Providence. This monk professed the most subtle and most refined mysticism, and, say the antagonists of quietism, he governed his devotees absolutely, by abusing the system of spirituality, which caused external acts to be regarded as indifferent, and sins as salutary proofs to tame our pride, and acquire for us inward perfection. It is even pretended that he attached his penitents doubly to him, by the charms of his doctrine, and the enjoyments without remorse which he permitted them.

Father Lacombe left his convent and accompanied the beautiful Jeanne into the diocese of Geneva, where they taught; but the bishop, scandalised by the strangeness of their doctrines, interdicted Father Lacombe, and drove him and his penitent from his diocese. They then retired to the city of Grenoble, where Jeanne Guyon published, with the approval of the clergy of the province, "The Short and Easy Way to Pray," and the Barnabite his "Analysis of Mental Prayer."

In these works the two Quietists developed their principles of the necessity of self-annihilation, even to complete inaction, in order to allow God to operate alone; they explained that the inner way admits of neither light, nor love, nor desire; they maintained that in prayer the faithful could pass even from the knowledge of God; that they ought never to think of chastisement, nor recompense, nor death, nor life, nor of eternity, nor of the saints, nor of the Virgin, nor of the humanity of Christ, nor of the attributes of God.

Besides her work on "The Short and Easy Way to Pray," Jeanne Guyon published "The Canticle of Canticles, explained according to the true, mystic sense;" and a third work, called "The Rule of the Associates of the Infancy of Jesus and the Torrents."

This last publication is unquestionably the most remarkable, on account of the singularity of the doctrines, and the extravagance of the opinions contained in it. Among other things, she explains, "that God sometimes hates a soul perfect in every gift, in every grace, in every virtue, and that for ever; that the fidelity of this soul then consists in allowing itself to be buried and crushed, in suffering its stench, and permitting itself to grow putrid in the full extent of the will of God, without even seeking to shun the corruption; that it ought to have no more consciousness, to confess without repentance, and to commune as if going to dinner; that it should be happy in finding itself a cause of horror to others, and forgotten by God, who leaves it to be spoiled in its rottenness. She affirmed that this absolute abandonment was the most sublime state into which grace could elevate the soul; that the Quietists then experienced infinite joys, and had visions which could not be recounted to the profane, from fear of soiling the imagination, though they left the mind pure, and entirely occupied with mystic thoughts."

Jeanne Guyon maintained that she had reached a point of perfection so sublime, that she saw clearly into the depths of souls, and exercised over them, as well as over the body a miraculous authority. In her extacies, she said, she was filled with graces for herself and others; that she ran a danger of suffocating, and ordered them to relieve her by unlacing her stays. Sometimes she made the assistants merely seat themselves, in silence, by her side, and she affirmed, that from the divine reservoir of her heart there was an overflowing which mildly relieved her; and that her acolytes, children of wisdom, received from their mother the measure of alimment which was necessary for each of them.

Finally, after five years of career and adventures, of success and reverses, Father Lacombe and his beautiful penitent finished what they called their mission, and returned to Paris, where the archbishop, thinking that he found a conformity between their doctrines and the errors of Molinos, which were condemned by the Holy See, wished to put an end to their preaching, and sent Father Lacombe to the bastille and confined Jeanne Guyon in the convent of the Daughters of Visitation, in the faubourg St. Antoine, to do penance there. But it turned out, that instead of being converted, and yielding to the pious exhortations of the nuns of the Visitation, it was the new recluse who led all her companions into the doctrines of pure disinterested love.

The cousin of Jeanne Guyon, Madame de la Maisonfort, who had been placed by la Maintenon at St. Cyr, to finish the education of the young boarders there, became enthusiastic in the cause of her relative, and spoke of her at court as of a persecuted saint. The dutchesses of Bethune, Beauvilices, Chevreuse, and Mortemart, became ardent Quietists, and Jeanne Guyon was soon the fashion.

Through the interference of her new protectresses, the beautiful Jeanne was set at liberty, and even obtained the distinguished favour of being presented to Madame de Maintenon. Her misfortunes, her resignation, her enchanting eloquence when she spoke of God, her remarkable beauty, rendered her interesting in the eyes of the favourite, and procured for her her friendship. She was admitted to the intimacy of the king, and soon counted among her spiritual daughters all the noble pupils at St. Cyr.

It was in this house that she met Fenelon, and that the liaison between the ardent Quietist and the tender abbot commenced. "The latter, for a long time addicted to a refined spiritualism," says St. Simon, "tasted the doctrines of Jeanne, and affirmed to la Maintenon, that the Quietist was the most sublime of saints. It was thus that he became the director of the distinguished sheep of the small flock which Jeanne Guyon had collected; affecting, however, not to conduct them but under the direction of that prophetess who was introduced into the conscience of these gentle maids. She also made constant visits to Paris, to the house of Monseigneur the duke of Burgundy himself, where she gave instructions to her faithful companions Madame de Morstein, the countess de Guiche, and other noble dames who left the court to come to profit by the manna which she spread in the desert of their souls."

An event was about to trouble the little flock; Fenelon was appointed to the archbishopric of Cambray. All the Quietists exclaimed, for it was the see of Paris they wanted for their director, and not that of Cambray, which they regarded with contempt as a country diocese. The archbishopric of Paris would have placed Fenelon at the head of the clergy, in a place of immediate and durable confidence, would have obliged every one to account to him, and would have placed him in a situation to dare every thing for Jeanne Guyon and her doctrine, which was propagating with extreme rapidity. Mysterious, however, as were the meetings of the adepts, the Jesuits were enabled to penetrate the secret of them; they were alarmed by the number and quality of the disciples of the Quietist; they attacked her works, and sought to raise scruples in the conscience of Louis the Fourteenth; they succeeded. The great king, fearful of having yielded to culpable suggestions, in protecting a woman accused of quietism, desired Father Bourdaloue to examine her doctrines; and in accordance with the opinions of the preacher, informed her that she must put an end to her visits to St. Cyr.

Madame de Maintenon wrote to Jeanne Guyon, that she had better, for her own safety, quit Paris and retire to some village, taking care not to discover the place of her retreat to any one; the poor persecuted obeyed, and sought to hide herself from attention and be forgotten; but it was too late. Public attention was awakened by the Jesuits, and they, holding it a point of honour to show their power over the mind of the king, resolved to destroy her. They first circulated a kind of confession, attributed to Father Lacombe, and in which the Barnabite asked pardon of God and men, for having fallen with his beautiful penitent into the excesses and misery of a frightful immorality; for having been precipitated by an impulse of madness and fury into disorders which the law prohibits, without, however, having had any intention of doing evil, and only because he persuaded himself that God exacted from him to accomplish all these abominations, although he had foreseen the terrible consequences of them. The good fathers then adroitly spread the most calumnious allegations concerning Jeanne, gave credit to suspicions the most derogatory to her honour, and sought to create the impression, that she concealed herself from fear of being unmasked before all.

Jeanne Guyon, advised by Fenelon of the outrageous accusations brought against her, determined to leave her retreat and demanded to be judged, herself and her writings, by a commission composed of an equal number of ecclesiastics and laymen. Her request was granted; the king appointed a commission composed of three ecclesiastical judges, Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, Monseigneur de Noailles, bishop of Chalons, and Tronson, the superior of the seminary of St. Sulpice; but he refused to join three laymen to them. Jeanne only obtained, through the influence of Madame de Maintenon, that Fenelon, who was not yet installed in the archbishopric of Cambray, should be admitted into the commission.

The four prelates held their meetings in the village of Issy, from which they were called the conferences of Issy." At the first meeting, Bossuet avowed that he understood very imperfectly the mystic works of the accused, and asked Fenelon to make extracts from them. The latter complied with the invitation, in the hope of being useful to his friend, and of making her innocence triumph.

Unfortunately, to prevent the judgment which might be rendered, the metropolitan of Paris, at the instigation of the Jesuits, claimed the right of deciding alone on a cause which was tried in his diocese; and before the prelates had had time to form an opinion on the doctrines of Jeanne Guyon, he published a mandement, in which he condemned the celebrated Quietist, as teaching false propositions, tending to heresy, contrary to the word of God, capable of scandalising the faithful, and of offending pious ears. What is the most remarkable in this censure is, that it was pronounced by a prelate who knew nothing of the books which he anathematised, nor of any of the works on piety which appeared.

The commissioners of Issy being unable to give the cause to Jeanne Guyon, against the archbishop, also condemned her; they proceeded, however, with more circumspection, and instead of censuring the books which were submitted to their examination, they composed thirty-four articles, diametrically opposed to the opinions taught by the Quietists, presented them to Jeanne, and induced her to subscribe to them. She signed, moreover, the pastoral instructions, which were published in support of the anti-mystic articles, and made an authentic abjuration of her pretended apostleship.

This submission procured for her a favourable certificate from Bossuet, attesting her innocence and her orthodoxy. But she soon allowed herself to be drawn on by her inspirations, and recommenced propagating the doctrines of quietism. The Jesuits immediately demanded a letter de cachet from the king, and she was conducted to Vincennes and thence to the bastille.

Bossuet then produced a book, called

"States of Prayer," in which he censured severely the celebrated Quietist. He wanted Fenelon to approve of it, which he refused to do, under the very honourable excuse, that he had promised to condemn the errors of Jeanne Guyon, and not her person. The archbishop of Cambray even announced to his colleague, that he should have no scruples, on every occasion, of testifying his esteem for this woman; that he would never denounce to the church as worthy of fire, her, who had committed no other wrong in his eyes, than that of not having explained herself in a sufficiently lucid manner, and whose religious sentiments he well knew. The virtuous prelate did not confine himself to this protest in favour of his old friend; he resolved to operate actively with Monseigneur de Noailles, who had been recently promoted to the archbishopric of Paris; he paid him several visits, and obtained from him an order for the release of Jeanne from the bastille, and her admission into a religious house of Vaurigard. He did still more, he undertook a justification of the doctrines of the poor recluse, and published the remarkable book, called "An Explanation of the Maxims of the Saints on the Inward Life."

Bossuet replied to him, attacked his work without circumspection, denounced it to public opinion as a concealed apology for quietism, a repetition of the writings of Jeanne Guyon, and called the archbishop of Cambray the new Montan of a second Priscilla.

Fenelon answered his adversary, complained bitterly that the bishop of Meaux had made him dream with his eyes open, and had lent him reasons which he had never held. The theological discussions soon degenerated into true disputes, and both prelates calumniated each other. To stop the scandal, Father la Chaise interfered, sided with the archbishop of Cambray, and declared that his antagonist had passed the bounds of propriety, and showed an irritation which was entirely contrary to the precepts of apostolical charity.

Bossuet, furious at the triumph of Fenelon, cast himself at the feet of the king, asked his pardon for not having sooner denounced the abominable doctrines of the new Molinists, and accused the archbishop of Cambray of favouring the heresy of the Quietists. This time the bishop of Meaux prevailed over his adversary, thanks to the support of Maitenon, who would not pardon Fenelon for his opposition to the publication of her secret marriage with Louis the Fourteenth. His majesty, after having listened favourably to Bossuet, wrote to the court of Rome to procure the condemnation of the book of "The Maxims of the Saints."

Notwithstanding the urgency of the monarch, his holiness manifested a great repugnance to persecuting a bishop, who had always proved himself to be one of the most zealous defenders of pontifical infallibility and omnipotence; and whilst yielding to the wishes of Louis the Fourteenth, he proceeded with extreme mildness, in hopes that the king, who was already sixty years old, and who was worn out by debauchery, would die in the mean time. He appointed to examine the work two commissions, which held, the one twelve conferences, and the second twenty-one, without deciding upon any thing; a third commission employed fifty-two sessions in determining on the censurable propositions in "The Maxims of the Saints," and thirty-seven in deliberating on the mode in which his holiness should censure them.

Whilst this affair was occupying the Roman theologians, they were proceeding in France to an information against Father Lacombe, who was detained in the castle of Vincennes, and whom they constrained by torture to sign a writing, in which he exhorted Jeanne Guyon to repent of her guilty intimacy with him and the archbishop of Cambray.

This confession, wrested from the poor monk, who had already become crazy from the bad treatment to which he had been submitted, was scandalously circulated in Paris, in order to cast infamy on Fenelon and the unfortunate Jeanne. It was in vain that the prelate protested against such an act, and demanded justice on his calumniators, in a letter which he sent by another prelate to Louis the Fourteenth. His majesty, instead of giving the slightest satisfaction to the archbishop of Cambray, broke out against the ambassador, called Fenelon a fanatical protector of vice, and Jeanne a corrupt extravagant, and announced that he was about to punish the two culprits. In fact, on the next day, the archbishop received an order of exile from the gracious monarch, and Madame de la Mothe Guyon was again plunged into the dungeons of the bastille. This celebrated woman remained there a whole year, and only left them to be exiled to one of the estates of her eldest son, where she lived for fifteen years in the practice of the most edifying virtues. Father Lacombe was transferred from Vincennes to Charenton, where he died a lunatic.

The bull of the holy father finally arrived from Rome, in which were condemned twenty-three propositions from the book of "The Maxims of the Saints." The archbishop of Cambray, who was already confined to his diocese, and did not wish to make his position worse, submitted to the ecclesiastical censures. Thus terminated the quarrel between the two most illustrious prelates of the seventeenth century, Fenelon and Bossuet.

The secular jubilee then opened, and the gold of the people was engulfed in the apostolic treasury; but Innocent the Twelfth had not the joy of contemplating the wealth which accumulated in the cellars of the Vatican; a slow fever, which weakened him for several months, carried him off on the 18th of September, 1700.

During the seventeenth century we have seen the pontiffs of Rome consume themselves in powerless efforts to dispute with kings, the prerogatives of their omnipotence, and become reduced, in order to escape from their nothingness, to excite theological quarrels, in order to give birth to heresies, and even to encourage direct attacks against religion, thus preferring sarcasm and strife to the indifference and forgetfulness of men. In the eighteenth century we will see the proud successors of the apostle crushed by a legion of sublime geniuses, and France finally break the double chains of superstition and despotism, sap the foundations of the papal colossus, break the sceptres of kings, and make a giant stride towards the conquest of liberty.

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

CLEMENT THE ELEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIRST POPE.

State of the church in the eighteenth century—Election of Clement the Eleventh—The history of the pope before his exaltation—He recognises the son of James the Second as king of England—He foments the divisions caused by the succession of Spain—He wishes to seize the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily—Death of the abbe de Rancé, the reformer of the Trappists—Quarrels between the Jansenists and Molinists on cases of conscience—Inundation and earthquake at Rome—The pope extorts money from France—Crusade against the Quesnellists—The Chinese worship is condemned at Rome—Death of Bossuet, bishop of Meaux—Bull Vincam Domini—Universal jubilee—The pope, after having declared for France in the war of the succession, joins the Empire—Knavery of Clement the Eleventh—Destruction of Port Royal des Champs—Assassination of the cardinal de Tournon by the Jesuits—Bull Unigenitus—Cabals of Father Tellier to have the bull received in the kingdom—Protest of the cardinal de Noailles and the French bishops against the constitution Unigenitus—Fenelon adheres to the bull—His death—Singular discovery of the antichristian belief of Fenelon—The Jesuit Tellier is driven from court by the duke of Orleans, the regent of France—Dispute between the Holy See and Savoy concerning the monarchy of Sicily—The abbe Alberoni and the Duke de Vendome—Alberoni becomes the minister of Philip the Fifth, king of Spain—Quarrel between Clement the Eleventh and Alberoni—The latter extorts from the pope the hat of a cardinal—The abbe Dubois, the confident and minister of the regent of France, endeavours to have bull "Unigenitus" received, in order to obtain the Roman purple—Letter of his holiness to the duke of Orleans—Bull "Pastoralis Officii"—The tribunal of the inquisition at Rome condemns the pastoral instruction of the archbishop of Paris—New disputes between Clement the Eleventh and Cardinal Alberoni—The pope causes the minister to be exiled from the Spanish dominions—His holiness makes efforts to unite the Russian to the Roman church—The Czar Peter the Great makes his buffoon pope, and marries him in public with grotesque ceremonies—Death of Clement the Eleventh.

WE are entering upon the eighteenth century, that is to say, on a period in which we shall see the sacerdotal influence annihilated, and the reason of mankind develop itself in a prodigious manner. Until now, man was wandering in the midst of thick darkness, the truth appeared to him but as a doubtful light in a morbid atmosphere; in the eighteenth century philosophy enlightens the minds of all, and mankind reconquers its rights.

How can the vessel of St. Peter, accustomed to sail in a dark and muddy sea, float in the ocean of light which covered the world? How can the papacy resist the formidable attacks of adversaries sworn to annihilate it, those terrible encyclopedists, those fathers of modern philosophy? The explanation of it is simple; the popes, finding themselves outflanked by the progress of the age, formed a connection with kings, made common cause with them, sought more than ever to prop the spiritual authority by material power, and marched to a sacrilegious crusade against the nations, sustained by the despots, and a cohort of Jesuits, priests, monks, nobles, and all that infernal brood which devours the substance of the people, and consumes the fruits of the earth in shameful idleness.

In the conclave which, as usual, was held at Rome, after the obsequies of Innocent the Twelfth, to proceed to the election of a new pontiff, the cardinals chose, as the most capable of steering the ship of St. Peter in the stormy times in which the church was, the cardinal John Francis Albani, aged only fifty years, and one of the youngest members of the sacred college, and proclaimed him pope by the name of Clement the Eleventh.

The new head of the church was descended from a noble family of Urbino; he had before filled the post of referendary, counsellor of the consistory, governor of Rieti, Civita Vecchia, and Sabino, and had, finally, been raised to the cardinalate by his predecessor. Having but just seated himself on the pontifical throne, he was employed with the ceremonies which take place at the close of each jubilee, and which are called "shutting the holy door;" he then took the reins of government in hand and placed himself as the arbiter of the destinies of Europe.

He addressed a brief to James the Second, the dethroned king of Great Britain, who had come to France to hide his shame, to console him in his exile, and to announce to him in the name of God, that he would return in triumph to London with an escort of Jesuits; a prediction which, most happily for England, was not realised. Some months afterwards, the infamous James the Second surrendered his soul to the devil in the castle of St. Germain en Laye, and made this singular exhortation to the prince of Wales his son, whose legitimacy was more than suspected: "Remember, my son, that if you ever remount the throne, we owe all to the pope and the Jesuits; spare no means to re-establish the Catholic religion in your kingdom; burn, sack, murder, and remember that is better to gain heaven than to merit the blessings of the people." The young prince promised to follow these instructions faithfully; immediately after the death of his father, he took the name of James the Third, and styled himself king of Great Britain, a title by which two or three valets, attached to his person, and the apostolic nuncio, saluted him.

The solicitude of Clement the Eleventh for the Stuarts, had only regard to the interests of the Holy See; for the pontiff did not believe they could ever be reinstalled on the throne of Great Britain, and he appeared so ardent in maintaining their interests only to excite disturbances in the three kingdoms, and call off the attention of the powers to that quarter, whilst he was preparing to seize Sicily, or the Milanese, or even the kingdom of Naples, which excited his covetousness.

These reasons of high policy determined him to pronounce secretly in favour of France, which had accepted the succession of Spain for Philip of Anjou, the grandson of Louis the Fourteenth, whilst remaining ostensibly a careless spectator of the long and bloody wars which the houses of Austria and Bourbon were waging. It was the intention of his holiness to preserve, as far as he could, an absolute neutrality, and not to recognise either Philip the Fifth or the archduke Charles as the lawful king of Spain, until the fate of arms had made the balance incline to one side or the other. But circumstances forced him, almost from the commencement of hostilities, to abandon the prudent line of conduct he had marked out. Alarmed by the rapidity of the march of the French armies, which had already invaded the Milanese, he thought that victory would remain constant to the generals of Louis the Fourteenth, and he hastened to declare that he regarded the wishes of the dead king of Spain as obligatory, and informed the belligerent powers that he would employ all the force of his authority to protect its execution in all that concerned the states of the Spanish peninsula.

He then put his frontier places in a state of defence, and levied an army to protect the ecclesiastical states, in case that through a reverse of fortune he should have to dread the vengeance of Austria. He sent a brief to the emperor to induce him not to choose Italy as the theatre of the war, or at least to spare the patrimony of St. Peter. But all his exhortations produced no effect; Prince Eugene entered the Milanese, restored the affairs of the archduke, made the pope tremble even in Rome, and compelled him to return to his former declarations.

If the sovereign pontiff appeared to be undecided in the political questions which were agitated around him, by way of compensation, he decided boldly in the theological quarrels, which had sprung up anew between the Molinists and Jansenists, on the occasion of a letter published by the abbe de Rancé, the reformer of the abbey of la Trappe, a fanatical debauchee, who, in despair at having lost the dutchess of Montbazou, his mistress, had renounced the world and retired to a solitude, to practise there the austerities of the first anchorites of the Thebaide. Before his retreat Rancé had entertained the ideas of the Jansenists, and following their example had condemned the pontifical omnipotence, the institution of the Jesuits, and the tyranny of kings: he had even declared himself a partizan of republican doctrines as being the application of the doctrine of fraternity preached by Christ. As soon as the cowl had re-covered his head, he prostrated himself before the papal infallibility, and on the death of Arnaud, the illustrious leader of the Jansenists, dared to write to the abbot Nicaise: "The great Arnaud is dead at last; after having pushed his career as far as he could, it has terminated. However they may talk, the question is settled; his condition and his authority were a great weight for his party. Blessed is he who has no other than Jesus . . ."

This reflection, which appeared to be a blame cast on the Jesuits, induced an energetic reply on the part of Father Quesnel, who was considered by his party as the successor of Arnaud, and who continued the work of propagation, although forced to conceal himself, and remain hidden in the environs of Brussels. Rancé replied, that he had not wished to condemn his old friends, that his intentions had been misinterpreted. The Jansenists were not satisfied, and demanded a formal retraction. The reformer of la Trappe answered as tartly, and the dispute became daily more embittered up to the time of his death.

As soon as Rancé had closed his eyes, the Molinists published an apocryphal letter attributed to the Trappists, which was extremely violent against the followers of the bishop of Ypres, and renewed their attacks against the five propositions. Father Quesnel, instead of replying, made use of the trick of a priest to surprise and conquer his adversaries; he imagined this case of conscience. He supposed the case of a provincial confessor, who, undecided as to the manner of behaving toward an ecclesiastic whose orthodoxy he suspected, had interrogated him on several points of doctrine; and in his pamphlet the skilful theologian asked the doctors to give him their opinion on the different replies the priest made to the confessor. The following are some of the controverted points:

"I condemn the five propositions attributed to Jansenius in the sense in which the church has condemned them; but on the question of fact, I think it is enough for me to maintain a silent and respectful submission, and as long as I shall not have been judicially convicted of having maintained any of these propositions, my belief cannot be suspected. In order, however, to reassure alarmed consciences, I will add this profession of faith: 'I believe that being obliged to love God as the end towards which we tend, all actions which do not refer to him, and which are not induced by some motive of charity or love, are so many sins. I affirm that it is a great sin to assist at divine service without any feeling of repentance, and with the wish to persevere in the irregularities of a condemnable life; I do not believe that devotion to the saints and the Virgin consists principally in the vain forms and ridiculous practices which certain rituals teach us; finally, I declare that in reading the Letters of St. Cyran, the Hours of Dumont, the conferences of Lucon, the Morality of Grenoble, I am acting in conformity with the rules of the church, which recommend the reading of religious books which are duly approved of.'" Forty doctors united to reply to this consultation. They declared that the sentiments of the ecclesiastic were not culpable, and that absolution might be granted him without exacting any retraction.

This decision was printed at Paris, and a large number of copies struck off. The Molinists were embittered at the forty doctors who had approved of the case of conscience, and the fiery Bossuet pursued them with extreme violence. The bishop of Chartres imitated his example, as did the archbishop of Paris, the cardinal de Noailles. This prelate declared that the case of conscience was contrary to the pontifical constitutions, tended to perpetuate troubles in the church, to favour equivocations, mental restrictions, and perjuries; and he summoned the doctors, under penalty of exclusion from the Sorbonne, and even of exile, to revoke their first decision. All obeyed, excepting only the doctor Petit Pied, who was constrained to leave the kingdom.

Quesnel immediately addressed a vigorous letter to the cardinal de Noailles; he condemned, in energetic terms, the violence which had been employed towards the doctors, to constrain them to a forced submission, which he called a public and outrageous falsehood, false testimony drawn forth by terror, shameful prevarication, unworthy cowardice. He followed up this new epistle by a small work in the form of a dialogue between two bishops. Among other stinging criticisms, one of these persons introduced on the scene, says to the other:

"We do not flatter, my dear lord; in a matter of reason, the mitre, the tiara, and the cross go for nothing; a crossed and mitred reason is still a human reason; we are the more liable to be deceived, since the episcopal functions engage us in a great number of puerile occupations, which we have not time to study and explore. To impose then on the faithful the decisions of a man, subject like all other men, as articles of faith, is to wish to degrade mankind."

This attack was too openly directed against pontifical infallibility for Clement the Eleventh not to hasten to fulminate his anathemas against the author of the case of conscience. His holiness excommunicated him, and sent to the king of France and the archbishop of Paris two terrible briefs against the Jansenists. "They are minds sprung from darkness to trouble the peace of kingdoms and the church," said the holy father, in his epistles; "they are audacious demons, who wish to overthrow the papacy and royalty; they are heretical republicans; agitators of the people, who must be silenced; finally, they are rebels, who must be repressed, tamed, even cut down by the edge of the sword, before they have undermined the foundations of the altar and the throne."

Louis the Fourteenth, who had all Europe against him, thought it imprudent to execute the orders of his holiness in all their force; he contented himself with banishing some refractory Jansenists, and with imposing silence on both parties. His majesty was not, besides, favourably disposed towards the holy father, on account of his refusal to give the investiture of Naples to Philip the Fifth; and his discontent was even increased by a matter of arbitration which had been carried to the tribunal of Clement the Eleventh, on the subject of a contest between the dutchess of Orleans and the elector Palatine.

This prince, the head of the Palatine branch of Neubourg, and the brother of the empress, had succeeded a brother of Madame, who died childless. The dutchess had presented herself as the heiress of the personal property, which was large, and of the female fiefs pertaining to the electorate, which had brought on very grave discussions. The two parties appealed, the one to the emperor, the other to the king of France, and obtained from them judgments dictated by the interests of their dynasties, which satisfied no one. As a last resort, the two families had referred it to the pope. It was at the time when the victories of Prince Eugene made the balance incline in favour of the emperor. His holiness ranged himself as usual on the side of the conqueror, confirmed the sentence pronounced by Leopold the First, declared the pretensions of Madame badly founded, and condemned the elector Palatine to pay her only three hundred thousand Roman crowns. The court of France maintained that the pope had surpassed his powers, and instructed the abbot of Thesac solemnly to protest, in the name of Madame, against this judgment.

His holiness was not disturbed by the anger of Louis the Fourteenth, being assured that he was under the protection of the emperor, who was then victorious; but as it was the destiny of Clement the Eleventh only to ex-cape from one danger to fall into another, his apprehensions of war were scarcely quieted, when two terrible events plunged Rome into consternation. In consequence of heavy rains, the Tiber rose above its banks, buried all the country under water, and destroyed the crops; then an earthquake, which lasted almost fifteen minutes, threw down whole streets, and buried very many inhabitants beneath the ruins of their houses. Thus on the one side the inundation of the Tiber, and on the other the earthquake, contributed to render the position of the pope extremely critical. Within the holy city, as without, the exhalations which escaped from the slime the river had left in retiring, had corrupted the atmosphere and engendered pestilential fevers, which daily carried off thousands of victims. The misery had become so universal, so profound, that two thirds of the inhabitants were reduced to the necessity of living on herbs, and those who wished to obtain a little bread or meat to sustain their miserable existence, were compelled to prostitute their wives or daughters to the ecclesiastics, who alone were rich enough to purchase this precious food. It was at once a curious and afflicting spectacle, to behold the dwellings of the priests transformed into so many seraglios, in which were to be found the youngest and handsomest girls of Rome. There was not the meanest clerk, who, under the pretext of charity, had not collected several of these unfortunates.

His holiness was alarmed by the consequences which might result from such licentiousness, and issued a bull enjoining on priests, prelates, and cardinals to maintain a conduct more in conformity with the priestly character, under penalty of being disgraced; he ordered them to restore at once to their families the women and young girls whom they had in their residences; he, moreover, expressly prohibited every ecclesiastic, under penalty of interdiction, from becoming intoxicated, gambling, or taking part in any orgies whilst Rome was in distress.

Other measures were then adopted to remedy the disasters which had fallen on the holy city. The council of the sovereign pontiff had the wisdom to decree, that the citizens, whose houses had been thrown down, should be exempted from imposts for several years; that poor young girls should be maintained at the expense of the city, and placed under the supervision of matrons, to prevent them from prostituting themselves for a livelihood, and, finally, that all public festivals and rejoicings should be suspended until a return of prosperity.

Admirable as were these ordinances, they were but a feeble solace for the evils of all kinds which burthened the population of Rome; that which starving people needed, was cargoes of corn; but the treasury of St. Peter was dry, and not in a condition to make extraordinary expenses. The cardinals had so well trafficked away their votes in the election of Clement the Eleventh, that all the wealth which was in the cellar of the Vatican, at the death of Innocent the Eleventh, as well as the enormous sums arising from the jubilee had passed into their hands. The holy father naturally turned towards France to repair the disorders which his simoniacal election had made in the finances; but like a skilful politician, he first restored the friendly intercourse between the court of Versailles and his see, which had for some time past received rude shocks. The occasion, moreover, suited admirably.

The archduke Charles had proclaimed himself, at Vienna, sovereign of Spain, by the name of Charles the Third, and had transmitted this information to the ambassadors of the empire at Rome, enjoining on them to celebrate this great event in the national church of the Germans, in order to force the pope, and engage him openly in their interests. His holiness did not fall into the snare; he sent for the representatives of Louis the Fourteenth and Philip the Fifth, to come to the Vatican, and declared to them that he did not approve of the demonstrations of the plenipotentiaries of the archduke; that if the law of nations prevented him from prohibiting the celebration of a religious festival, he should at least take measures to show to all Europe, that he did not recognise the son of the emperor as the lawful king of the Spaniards. In fact, the cardinal Carpegna informed the Austrian ambassadors, that the pope would prohibit them the use of the German church, if they exposed his portrait with that of the archduke, clothed in the insignia of Spanish royalty.

This conduct procured for Clement the Eleventh, a reconciliation with the great king, and a large sum of money for alms. Father la Chaise, as well as all the French Jesuits, hastened to take advantage of the circumstances, and proposed to his holiness to allow him new subsidies, if in return he would consent to pronounce against the Jansenists, and employ his influence over the king of Spain, to obtain the surrender of Father Quesnel, who, from his retreat, did not cease to carry on a rough war with them. Clement the Eleventh agreed to the bargain, and induced Philip the Fifth to give an order to the marquis of Bedmar, who commanded for him in the Low Countries, to seize Quesnel and his disciples wherever they were.

The spies of the Jesuits had already discovered the retreat of their formidable adversary, and as soon as the Spanish governor received the instructions of his sovereign, it became easy for him to make the arrest. A troop of police agents, conducted by the Jesuits, went into a part of the country, called the Refuge de Forêt, where the venerable Jansenist dwelt, and led him away prisoner to the archbishop of Brussels. Fortunately, a French gentleman enabled him to escape, and furnished him with the means of getting to Holland. They, however, continued proceedings against the papers they had discovered in his retreat, and condemned him for contumacy to excommunication and confinement in a monastery, until the Holy See, or rather the Jesuits were satisfied; prohibiting him from printing any thing, under penalty of perpetual imprisonment.

The disciples of Ignatius Loyola immediately thundered forth songs of victory, and proclaimed every where that they were in favour with the pope. This success emboldened them to dare to ask Clement the Eleventh, to proceed to judgment on the affair of Chinese worship, which had been pending at the court of Rome for a great many years. It was as follows:—In 1645, during the pontificate of Innocent the Tenth, in accordance with the report of Father Morales, a Dominican, the society of the propaganda had provisionally prohibited the worship which the Jesuits rendered to Confucius in the Catholico-Chinese ceremonies, which these good fathers used to obtain the confidence of the emperor, the mandarins, and the people of the Celestial empire; Alexander the Seventh, on the other hand, had in 1656, on the remonstrances of Father Martini, a Jesuit, authorised, through the congregation of the inquisition, the exercise of the same ceremonies, and had declared that they were necessary for the maintenance of Catholicism in China. Notwithstanding this decision, the different religious orders, who disputed for the glory of establishing their sway in these provinces, continued to carry on a violent war against each other, which threatened to disturb the tranquillity of the Chinese empire, and drew on them a long persecution by the sovereign.

Up to 1684, the quarrels had lost neither their vivacity nor their animosity, when Father Gregory Lopez, a Dominican, who had gone over into the camp of the Jesuits, and had been made, through their influence, bishop of Basileum, apostolic vicar, and then titular metropolitan of the capital of China, wrote to the pontiff in the same year:—"Most holy father, I have learned, that my former brethren, the Dominicans, led away by a false zeal, have written to you that my defection was a dishonour to the order, and have sought to injure me in your opinion. I hasten then to explain my conduct to you. If I have joined the Jesuits, it is because I discovered that their methods of propagating Catholicism were preferable to those of the other orders; and I could the better judge of it, since I am a Chinese by birth, and consequently fitter than another to decide what suits the men of the country, being better learned in the language, and more skilful in reading Chinese books than any European."

These letters of Lopez provoked new decretals from Alexander the Seventh, which confirmed the former bulls concerning the Chinese rites, and authorised the worship rendered to Confucius, as well as the ceremonies celebrated in honour of the dead, though their worship constituted a true adoration, and these dead ceremonies were to be positively regarded as sacrilegious and idolatrous, according to the spirit of the Christian religion. These practices consisted, for the inhabitants of the Chinese empire, in prostrating themselves until their forehead touched the ground, at the sacred name of the philosopher, written in large characters on a box exposed on a table, with incense pans and lighted candles. The mandarins rendered this adoration to him when they took possession of their governments, bachelors when they received their degree, governors of cities and men of letters renewed it twice a month. The ceremonies celebrated in honour of the dead were three in number, and were practised at different periods. That which took place before inhumation, consisted in placing the portrait of the deceased on a table before a coffin, and above it a box which bore the name of the dead. Flowers, perfumes and lighted candles, were arranged symmetrically on both sides, after which the relatives and friends came to take part in the grief, saluted the coffin, prostrated themselves, struck the earth with their foreheads, and deposited near the box, the perfumes, flowers, fruits, and candles they had brought.

The second commemorative ceremony took place twice a year; on those days every family spread a table on which was placed the portrait of their most illustrious ancestor. On the right and left, on tablets, were traced the names of the other dead of the family, with the quality, employment, age, and day of decease of each of them. All the relatives assembled in this saloon, and came to deposit on the table decanters of wine, plates of food, perfumes, and candles, without failing to make the usual genuflexions and salutes.

The third ceremony was practised but once a year, at the beginning of the month of May. The heads of families went with their wives and children into the cemeteries where their relatives were interred, tore away the thorns and plants which surrounded the tombs, reiterated the marks of grief and respect they had paid them at the time of their death, and placed on the tombstones food and wine, of which they made a sumptuous repast. Such was the national worship which the disciples of Ignatius Loyola were willing to retain, the better to assure their rule over the people.

A member of the society of the propaganda, named Maigrot, scandalized by the conduct of the Jesuits, undertook to put an end to such crying abuses; he made a terrible statement which he sent secretly to the commission of the holy office, beseeching it to order an inquiry, and have the truth of his charges verified. The matter was conducted with so much mystery, that the company of Jesus was not informed of what was going on against them for two years, and then by a writing called "Questions in regard to the Chinese ceremonies," which Pope Innocent the Twelfth communicated to them. This book excited a general reprobation against the good fathers throughout all Europe, whom it accused of being nothing less than favourers of idolatry, and corrupters of the Catholic religion. A letter of the minister Jurieu, the head of the foreign missions, gave them a still more terrible blow, and became the signal for a strife in which crowds of pamphleteers, of every belief, took part. The children of Ignatia, however, made head against the storm, and obtained a delay of the judgment which the society of the propaganda was ordered to make. At last, in despite of their intrigues, the court of Rome sanctioned, by a decree of the 20th. of November, 1704, the sentence which the society had already rendered against the Chinese worship, and ordered the cardinal de Tournon to go into the Celestial empire to abolish idolatry, and arrest the disorders of the missionaries.

Whilst the Society of Jesus was undergoing this check, to increase its misfortune, it lost one of its fiercest adepts. In his turn disappeared from the earth the famous Bossuet, that proud prelate, so terrible to the weak, so basely servile to the strong. This proud bishop who, during the whole course of his life, had shown himself to be the apologist of absolute monarchy, and of excessive Catholicism, the champion of authority under its most tyrannical forms, the apostle of the edifice which all minds were engaged in demolishing, the enemy of that liberty which his essentially despotic genius could not understand, and which France was preparing to salute with enthusiasm.

He died dressing himself in his shroud, boasting of the triumphs which he had gained, and enumerating, with a ferocious joy, the number of victims whom he had crushed—Arnaud, all the cohort of Port Royal, Fenelon, Jeanne Guyon, Father Lacombe, and so many others besides! And yet this insolent priest, so harsh, so implacable towards others, had not only trespassed several times in his life, but even, what will seem incredible, had urged his irreverence for the Catholic religion so far as to violate the sacred laws of the church. Bossuet the Jesuit, the bishop of Meaux, the excessive fanatic, was married. This fact is attested, in a formal manner, by Jean Denis, the secretary of the cardinal de Bissy, who has left us very interesting memoirs of the court and clergy of France.

Voltaire also declares, that several members of the family of Secousse, which was allied to that of Mademoiselle Desvieux, the wife of Bossuet, related to him the details of this affair. We will add, in corroboration of these proofs, that the archives of the city of Meaux show, that the bishop had acquired for one Mademoiselle Desvieux, the property de Maulên, of which she took the name; that it was publicly notorious that his eminence made large and frequent sacrifices of money for her; that he saw her frequently, familiarly, and lengthily, at her own house, at all hours of the day and night; that he was much in debt for her; that at his death, his heirs having refused to pay his debts, the creditors had commenced proceedings against the domains of the pretended lady of Maulên, and had probed judicially, that she was the lawful wife of the prelate; that the latter, to save her property, had threatened the relatives of Bossuet to make her marriage contract public; and that the family, to avoid dishonouring his memory, had determined to pay the debts. But though the proceedings were at once suspended, it remained none the less proved, for all those who had assisted in the controversy of this singular affair, that Madame de Maulên was well and duly the lawful wife of Bossuet, bishop of Meaux.

This family quarrel excited at the time but little attention, the minds of men being strongly occupied by the wars of the succession, and the persecutions directed by the great king against the unfortunate Calvinists of Cevennes, the Vivarais, and Gevaudan. In these last provinces it arose from the vexatious proceedings of which the agents of the police and the officers of the despot were guilty. They drove the poor people who could not pay the capitation, from their huts; and some of them went so far as to sell, in the public place, the straw which served for their beds. Exasperated by such treatment, the Calvinists resolved to take vengeance on their oppressors. In several villages of the Cevennes they assembled in numerous bands, surrounded the houses of the receivers by night, seized the fiscal officers, and hung them to trees with their lists attached to their necks. To avoid being recognised, the executioners of this terrible justice had placed shirts over their clothes, which gave them the name of Camisards. The revolt soon extended through the whole chain of the Cevennes, and Louis the Fourteenth had no other mode of crushing the heresy, but to proceed to a general massacre of the Calvinists. Perhaps the great king would not have succeeded in taming this courageous population, if he had not been seconded by the Jesuits in the work of extermination.

Therefore when these latter, with their hands dripping in the blood of the Camisards, presented themselves before the king to claim his interference in their quarrels with the Jansenists, his majesty sent at once an ambassador to the court of Rome, to solicit from Clement the Eleventh a new bull of excommunication against the disciples of the great Arnaud. The pontiff conformed to the wishes of Louis the Fourteenth, and fulminated the terrible bull "Vineam Domini," in which his holiness attacked directly the respectful silence, under the pretext, that the subterfuge of the case of conscience prevented them from condemning internally the book of Jansenius as heretical, that it destroyed no error, and did not satisfy the obedience due to the apostolic constitutions. Thus, the Jansenists could neither speak nor keep silence without being declared guilty of heresy; and there remained no alternative for them but that of submitting to the Jesuits, their implacable enemies.

Louis the Fourteenth presented the bull of the pope to the parliament for registry, and to avoid all opposition on the part of the young counsellors, he joined to it a declaration, in which he announced his wish to dry up the source of a poisonous doctrine, to dissipate the miserable remains of an error which reappeared under a thousand forms, glided about in darkness, and even fortified itself by silence. The bull was registered, and then sent to all the bishops of the kingdom.

It had been first submitted to an examination of an assembly of the clergy, presided over by the cardinal de Noailles; and the prelate, while accepting it, declared that the constitutions of the popes were not always infallible, even in the decision of facts of doctrine. Clement the Eleventh protested earnestly against the irreverence of such language, and obtained from Louis, that the archbishop of Paris should be compelled to retract what he had advanced in the meeting of the French bishops, and to recognise that the head of the church possessed the privilege of absolute infallibility in matters of faith.

His holiness was then engaged in remodeling his finances, and found no better means of making the gold of the simple flow into his coffers, than by publishing an extraordinary jubilee. But as it was scarcely six years since the secular jubilee had taken place, he took for his theme the necessity resting on the church to implore the Divinity to put an end to the wars. This move succeeded marvelously well; bands of imbecile pilgrims came from all parts, who gave their money in exchange for benedictions, indulgences, exemptions, absolutions, and other merchandise of the same kind.

Notwithstanding the prayers of the devout, the war still continued; and the troops of Prince Eugene invaded the duchy of Ferrara, and seized on the strong places which were most convenient to enable them to ransack the people of the neighbouring provinces. The pontiff, seeing the indifference of celestial powers to succour him, tried terrestrial means to resist the arms of the emperor. He threw three thousand men into the city of Ferrara, to place it in a condition to sustain a siege, and gave the command of it to the cardinal Casoni; he then levied a corps of four thousand foot soldiers for the defence of the patrimony of St. Peter, appointed the count Marsigli generalissimo of his armies, and formed a defensive league with all the petty princes who had the same interest as himself in repulsing the arms of the house of Austria. These expenses having made a large hole in his purse, he was constrained to ask authority from the sacred college to draw upon the treasures of Sixtus the Fifth, which were deposited in the cellars of the castle of San Angelo, and which a law prohibited from touching, unless the existence of the Holy See were in danger.

These measures, though wisely combined, produced no favourable result; Prince Eugene led his victorious armies through all the provinces of Italy; Naples even fell beneath the sway of the archduke, through the treason of the cardinal Grimani, who was its viceroy—"a wretch of the first order," says St. Simon, "who took no pains to conceal his turpitudes; a violent and furious priest, who was the avowed enemy of Clement the Eleventh." Already had the dominions of the grand duke of Tuscany, the dukes of Parma and Placenza, the republic of Genoa, and a great number of cities been constrained to receive German garrisons, and to pay enormous contributions for the war.

In this extremity, the pope determined to open negotiations with the marquis de Prie, the plenipotentiary of the emperor. The latter made, as a first condition for the withdrawal of the troops from the states of the church, that Clement should make a promotion of a cardinal in the name of the archduke, and should give to that prince the title of king of Spain. His holiness made some difficulty in yielding to this demand, since he comprehended that such a manifestation would place him at enmity with the king of France, and compromise his temporal authority; but on the announcement that the prince of Darmstadt was quitting Naples to come to Rome with his army, and that the Anglo-Dutch fleet had appeared on the waters of Livourna, he declared that he was ready to do what the emperor required. The marquis de Prie having become more exacting, since he had perceived the alarm of the holy father, went to the pontifical palace, and announced to the cardinals assembled in consistory, that the ecclesiastical states would be placed in fire and blood, unless his holiness immediately subscribed to the following conditions: 1. "That he should disarm his strong places, dismiss all his troops, and retain neither Frenchmen nor Spaniards in his service; 2. That he should recognise the archduke as lawful sovereign of Spain, by the name of Charles the Third, and should grant him the investiture of the kingdom of Naples; 3. That he should grant winter quarters to fifteen thousand imperialists in different places of the church; 4. That he should pay a contribution of a hundred thousand Roman crowns towards defraying the expenses of the war.

Clement asked for a respite of some days, to be enabled to implore the mercy of God, and to beseech him to soften the heart of the emperor, that he might obtain more favourable terms. He made, on this occasion, processions through all the streets of Rome, and traversed the holy city, followed by his clergy; but the marquis de Prie was not moved by the tears of the holy father, and abated none of his pretensions. His holiness, finding that he had neither peace nor truce to hope for from his enemy, determined to ask mercy, yielded to the demands of the Austrian ambassador, and solemnly recognised the archduke as lawful king of Spain, in the presence of the ambassadors of the courts of France and Madrid. The latter protested against such a violation of the oaths of his holiness; they declared this recognition null, since neither Clement the Eleventh nor his cardinals could revoke a preceding bull granted voluntarily, in which they recognised Philip the Fifth as the sole and lawful king of the Spanish peninsula; they then sallied forth from the Vatican, and quitted Rome.

On the same day, a treaty was signed between the church and the empire; hostilities immediately ceased in the ecclesiastical states, the blockade of Ferrara was raised, and the hostile troops who were in the neighbourhood of Rome, immediately returned to join the army at Naples.

Scarcely had the imperialists quitted the territories of the church, when Clement the Eleventh, in contempt of the engagements which he had contracted with the emperor, proceeded publicly to bless the swaddling clothes of a child to which the wife of Philip the Fifth had given birth, and sent them to Madrid by an extraordinary nuncio, who had orders to assist at the oath which the deputies of Spain were to take to the young prince of the Asturias, in recognising him as the presumptive heir to the crown. He then convened the cardinals in convocation, to decide if he had a right to recognise the archduke as the heir of King Charles the Second. There, as was expected, the members of the sacred college, who were favourable to the house of Austria, decided in the affirmative; the Italians, who were the most numerous, protested that this recognition was null of itself, having been wrested by force of arms. The sovereign pontiff used this divergency of opinions as a pretext for not deciding between the two parties, and for maintaining his system of neutrality, whilst having recognised two kings of Spain.

From that time Clement the Eleventh did not appear to trouble himself any more about this political question, and gave all his attention to the new persecutions by the Jesuits against the Jansenists, on the occasion of a translation of the New Testament which Father Quesnel had published, with commentaries on each verse, or "moral reflections." This book was but a new edition of a work which Bishop Vialart had approved of in 1671, which the Doctors Hidenx and du Pin had accepted in 1687, to which the cardinal de Noailles had given his approval in 1693, and of which he had said, among other things, "We find here all that is most beautiful and touching that the fathers have written concerning the gospel, and that the most sublime truths of religion were there treated with that force and mildness of the Holy Spirit which make them relished by the hardest hearts." It was, however, on its reappearance handed over by the Jesuits for the censure of the court of Rome, and the body charged to examine it declared that it was heretical in all its parts, that it was not susceptible of correction, and that the reading of it should be absolutely prohibited. In conformity with this decision, Clement the Eleventh proscribed this New Testament with the moral reflections, by a brief which prohibited the printing and reading of it; he, moreover, enjoined on the faithful who possessed copies of it, to carry them to the inquisitors of the faith, that they might be burned.

This last clause, which was contrary to the usages of France, in which temporal executions are reserved for the secular power, prevented the brief from being received in that kingdom. The Jesuits, however, cried out victory, and Father Tellier, who had been appointed confessor to the king, solemnly announced that he was about to crush Jansenism, which he called a hydra with a thousand heads. He began by attacking Port Royal des Champs, which he regarded as the hearthstone of the evil, and which, however, was but a poor monastery, inhabited by some old nuns. Father la Chaise had already induced Louis the Fourteenth to make an edict prohibiting the nuns from admitting any girl to make a profession, for which cause the community insensibly dwindled away; but Father Tellier did not think the remedy sufficient, he wished to finish it at a blow, so that if any of these poor women survived the great king, they might not be able to ask from his successor for authority to receive novices.

A pretext was not wanting for him to attain his ends; the venerable Jesuit revived the bull "Veniam Domini," which had proscribed respectful silence, and under pretext that the nuns of Port Royal des Champs were guilty of keeping silence, he caused the cardinal de Noailles to enjoin on them, in the name of the king, to sign the bull without restriction. The holy girls refused to do as they were bid, and appealed to the pope. His holiness decided that it was unnecessary to constrain the nuns to sign the bull without restriction; it was enough for them to have approved of it under the benefit of the peace of Clement the Ninth. This result was not what Father Tellier had expected, and the reply of the pontiff appeared to him to be a Gordian knot, easier to cut than to untie; he then resolved to change his batteries to obtain the suppression of the monastery. He availed himself of the division of the nuns of Port Royal into two houses; that of Paris, which was placed under the direction of the company of Jesus, and that of des Champs, to represent to his royal penitent that the latter of these communities had been maintained through toleration; that it was best for the interests of religion to unite all the nuns of that abbey, in order to place things on their former footing, and he proposed to preserve the convent of Paris, which was very important, in preference to that of des Champs, which had scarcely the means of subsistence, and which contained only some obstinate old women, whom it was impossible to bring to reason on questions of doctrine.

His majesty, never refusing the good father any thing, issued a decree in council, by virtue of which Port Royal des Champs was invested during the night by detachments of French and Swiss guards, under the orders of d'Argenson, the lieutenant of police, the doors were broken in by squads of the guard, the nuns dragged from their cells in their night dresses, and conducted to the chapter to listen to a letter de cachet, which suppressed the community, and condemned them to seclusion in other monasteries. In consequence of this order the poor nuns were immediately put into carriages, and conducted separately to different convents, situated at twenty, thirty, and even fifty leagues from Paris. To heighten the ignominy, each carriage was escorted by horse archers, as was done when public women were removed. When the house was empty, d'Argenson had it rummaged by his police blood hounds from the eaves to the cellar, seized all the papers, and carried them to Father Tellier, rendering to him an account of the expedition. The good father, encouraged by his success, wished to render his victory complete by annihilating even the buildings of this celebrated community. He solicited and obtained an order from the great king, which enjoined on the families of those whose ancestors were interred in Port Royal des Champs, to have them exhumed and taken elsewhere, in a month's time; then, and still by a royal ordinance, he caused the church and abbey to be razed, as was the custom with the houses of regicides, without leaving one stone on another; only, it was not sown with salt, thanks to the interference of the archbishop of Paris, who interfered to prevent this last profanation.

Thus Father Tellier attained the end he had proposed, and the Society of Jesus could add this triumph to that which they obtained in China over the cardinal de Tournon. This venerable prelate had been sent, about the year 1704, with the title of patriarch of Antioch, and apostolic vicar, to verify the exactness of the accusations brought against the Jesuits, and to interdict the idolatrous ceremonies which those religious had practised, contrary to the rules of the church. On his arrival in the Celestial empire, the patriarch had satisfied himself of the fidelity of the reports which had been made to the sovereign pontiff, and, in conformity with his instructions, had assembled at Canton the heads of the different missions, on whom he had enjoined, in the name of the Holy See, to take from their churches the signs and emblems which pertained to the worship of Confucius, of heaven, and of ancestors.

The Jesuits dared not resist him openly; but they acted in the dark, and used their influence over the emperor Khang-li, to dispose him towards the legate, and represented the patriarch as a dangerous fanatic, who had come to China to subvert religion and reduce the people of Asia beneath the sway of the Roman pontiff. The monarch, who was excessively jealous of his absolute authority, saw an enemy in the patriarch; when the latter came to Peking to be admitted to his presence, he gave him an ungracious reception, and on the next day sent him an order to quit his capital immediately. The prelate obeyed, quitted the court of the Celestial empire, went to Nankin and published the famous edict in which he interdicted the Christians of China from the idolatrous practices authorised by the Jesuits, and enjoined on the missionaries to conform to his instructions under penalty of ecclesiastical censures.

This command excited the anger of the Jesuits very much; without losing time they solicited and obtained an order from the emperor to arrest the patriarch and conduct him to Macao, where he was thrown into a dungeon, ironed hand and foot, and submitted to frightful treatment. At the same time, the society wrote to the court of Rome against the apostolic vicar, and demanded his recall. But Clement the Eleventh, notwithstanding his attachment to this company, dared not affront the judgment of men, and instead of approving of the conduct of the Jesuits, declared that the patriarch had deserved well of the Holy See, and sent to him, in his prison at Macao, the insignia of the dignity of cardinal. The unfortunate man did not long enjoy his new title, for, a few days afterwards, his enemies poisoned him.

All these victories exalted the Jesuits, and pushed them on to show themselves more enterprising than ever; in France, sustained as they were by Maintenon and Louis the Fourteenth their audacity appeared openly, and they did not fear to attack persons most eminent for their functions or their learning. Thus, they made a kind of levy of bucklers against the cardinal de Noailles, to punish him for having approved of the moral reflections of Quesnel, and for having condemned the violence exercised towards the nuns of Port Royal des Champs; they endeavored to injure him with the bishops of his party, and with the doctors, who had, until now, remained indifferent, neutral, or strangers to all the religious quarrels. It is supposed that it was at this time that Tellier enrolled the great king among the Jesuits, from the ardour which the monarch evinced in the new theological war. Thanks to his powerful interference, the moral reflections of Quesnel were again brought forward, and the pope was so urgently solicited to condemn them by a special bull that he could not avoid obeying, and determined to launch the celebrated bull "Unigenitus," which declared one hundred and one propositions of that remarkable book to be attached of heresy.

We may relate on this subject, that the ambassador of France, Amelot, having asked Clement the Eleventh, why he had said that this celebrated work contained one hundred and one erroneous propositions, without specifying any of them, his holiness replied with artlessness, "What do you want me to do? I find nothing to blame in this book; but Father Tellier having said to the king that it contained more than one hundred censurable propositions, d'Aubenton and Cardinal Fabroni, who are both Jesuits, have compelled me to exceed this number; I have made but one more."

This bull condemned the propositions of Quesnel as false, captious, of evil tendency, pernicious, rash, injurious, not only to the church, but also to the secular power; as seditious, infamous, blasphemous, favouring heresies and schism; as heretical, as renewing the errors of Luther and Calvin, and especially those of Jansenius. It moreover declared to the faithful of both sexes, that whosoever should teach, sustain, or put forth these propositions, whether jointly or separately, or who should even talk about them, in public or private, except to condemn them, incurred by this act alone, without need of ulterior decisions, the ecclesiastical censures and secular penalties pronounced against heretics.

His holiness, by virtue of his apostolic omnipotence, declared the work of Quesnel to be proscribed under every name, and in every language in which it had been or might hereafter ever be printed, as being fit to capture and seduce innocent souls by words filled with mildness, and the false appearances of the most pious instruction; he also anathematized all books and pamphlets, in manuscript or printed, which might be published in the defence of this dangerous work, and he prohibited all Catholics from reading, copying, retaining in their memory, or using them, unless they desired to be pronounced guilty and punishable with spiritual and temporal penalties inflicted on heretics. "Such was that abominable constitution 'Unigenitus,'" says St. Simon, "so fatal to the state, so advantageous to the Jesuits, to the ultra montanes, ignorant priests, swindling monks, and all the wretches of the regular and secular orders, and of which the consequences were to engender disorders, perfidy, violence, and persecutions, under which the kingdom groaned for more than thirty years; it was that constitution whose appearance produced effects so extended, so frightful, that morality, customs, the laws themselves have been overturned by it, and which has replaced the ordinary tribunals by military commissions which have unceasingly inundated France with letters de cachet, and which have completely annihilated justice."

D'Aubenton and Fabroni, the true authors of the bull, the tools of the Society of Jesus, had pushed their audacity so far as to condemn the formal texts of St. Paul, which all ages and all heresies had respected as the oracles of the Holy Spirit; they had not even respected the doctrines of St. Augustine and the fathers, which had, however, been approved by general councils.

According to Bruys, one of the historians who have written on the pontificate of Clement the Eleventh, the two Jesuits, to have this work of infamy passed, acted like robbers, keeping the printers in confinement lest their plan should be noised abroad, and having the number of copies they judged necessary, clandestinely struck off; the author adds, that they then went to communicate their labour to Clement the Eleventh, enjoining on him to affix his signature to the bull; that his holiness having protested against their condemnation of the texts of St. Paul and St. Augustine, and having expressed a doubt whether the sacred college would consent to approve of such impieties, Fabroni replied that he would not suffer his work to be submitted to revisers; that the right of condemnation belonged to the vicar of God alone, in his capacity of infallible pontiff; that it was to him, Clement the Eleventh, he addressed himself, and not to his cardinals; finally, Bruys affirms, that the latter objecting, that he had solemnly promised the members of the sacred college to promulgate no bull without having consulted them, that Fabroni approached the holy father, his face livid, his hand clenched, and spoke to him in a low voice, at which Clement the Eleventh, trembling and alarmed, immediately took up a pen and signed the constitution. All writers agree, that one morning, after a conference with the pope, the cardinal de Fabroni set up the bull "Unigenitus" in the Champ de Flora, and placarded it on the doors of St. Peter, as well as those of the principal churches of the city.

When the news of this act of compliance with the desires of the Jesuits was spread through Rome, a universal cry of reprobation arose against Clement the Eleventh; the cardinals, the bishops, the heads of the orders protested against the terms of the bull, and addressed energetic remonstrances to the sovereign pontiff, in which they said, that he was the first of the successors of the apostles who had dared to raise his hand against the sacred texts of the holy books, and to censure the most sublime propositions of St. Paul. His holiness replied to these representations by subterfuges; and when the sacred college came in a body to summon him to retract this bull of scandal, he shed tears, but steadily refused to review his decision.

Fabroni, and Father Aubenton were not content with promulgating this bull at Rome; in the intoxication of their success, they despatched a large number of copies to the members of their society, and more especially to Father Tellier, and the apostolic nuncio at the court of Louis the Fourteenth, that they might consult about the publication of it in France. The great king, in his capacity as a Jesuit, applauded the victory which the members of his company had gained, and immediately signified to the regular and secular clergy to receive the new constitution with blind submission. But in France, as at Rome, it excited a general indignation; the cardinal de Rohan declared that it was heretical; the cardinal de Noailles protested against its tenour, and accused the pope of an attempt on the liberties of the Gallican church; Bissy, bishop of Meaux, though the intimate friend of de Maintenon, pronounced against its adoption; the courts of justice, the chapters, the ministers, the courts, the capital, the provinces, equally protested against it. Father Tellier was firm; he reprimanded Bissy, and knowing the ambition of that prelate, warned him that he would not obtain the hat of a cardinal but as the price of submission to the king; he strongly rebuked Rohan, and represented to him that he incurred great danger in not keeping the promises which had procured for him the post of grand almoner; as for the cardinal de Noailles, he suffered him to manifest his opposition, in hopes of destroying him in the opinion of the monarch.

He then thought of having the bull approved by the clergy, which was an enterprise of the more difficulty as the majority of the bishops was opposed to him. The following was the mode adopted by this new Escobar to filch the adhesion which was necessary for him. He commanded the bishops who were devoted to him, to assist at an ecclesiastical meeting convened in the capital, and under divers pretexts dismissed to their dioceses those whom he feared; he "then thrust into the assembly," to use his own expression, the bishops in partibus of his coterie, and those of recent formation, who had not yet received bulls of installation. To the observation made to him, that these ecclesiastics had no right to vote, "What matters it whether it is regular or not, provided the council accepts the constitution 'Unigenitus!'" With this shoe-horn we will see who will dare resist the pope, the king, and myself."

Forty prelates then assembled in the hotel Soissons, under the presidency of the cardinal de Noailles, to deliberate on the acceptance of the constitution. The assembly commenced by an examination of the propositions about grace; which was only done for form, for none of the commissioners dared to explain himself on this dangerous subject, from fear of being reported to the terrible Father Tellier. The cardinal de Rohan and the bishop of Bissy, who had given in their submission, were commissioned to defend the bull, and to defend its articles in the terms employed for the collation of this abominable work. Thus the bishop of Blois having remarked, that a great number of the censured propositions were not textually extracted from the book of Quesnel; Bissy exclaimed, "Silence to all the defenders of the infamous Oratorian. We are assembled to condemn, not to justify him. Whatever he may have written, he is guilty; for the truth itself becomes a falsehood in passing through the mouth of a follower of Jansenius."

These deliberations were, however, much protracted; for the cardinal de Noailles, and the prelates who shared his apprehensions, dared not pronounce too openly against the acceptance, and desired to paralyse the effect of an acceptance, by considerations placed at the beginning of their decree. But Father Tellier had unveiled their plan, and to prevent its execution, caused it to be proclaimed by the king, that they must accept it purely and simply, or not at all. At last, after three months of intrigue, the assembly decreed that it recognised, with a holy joy, that the bull "Unigenitus" contained the true doctrine of the church, and that it accepted it with the submission and respect which the clergy owed to their head, the Roman pontiff; that it should consequently be translated into French, and be rendered obligatory in all the dioceses of the kingdom.

The bishops who were submissive to Father Tellier hastened to address their flocks, vaunting the excellence of this constitution; and among them was distinguished the archbishop of Cambray, the obsequious Fenelon, who sought to obtain his recall to court, and the termination of the exile to which he had been condemned since the affair of quietism. His mandamus commences thus, "Oh, Roman church! oh, holy city! oh, dear and common country of all true Christians! There is not in Jesus Christ, neither Greek, nor Scythian, nor barbarian, nor Jew, nor Gentile! all men form but one people in your bosom; all are fellow citizens of Rome, all are Roman Catholics. Oh, church, from whence St. Peter will confirm his brethren for ever! Oh, if I ever forget you, may my right hand forget itself, and my tongue wither in my palate, if you are not to my last sight the object of my songs." He did not receive the reward of eloquence, Tellier constantly opposed any relaxation of rigour by the king, and maintained the order of exile which prohibited him from leaving his diocese.

Notwithstanding the approval of some bishops sold to the Jesuits, the appearance of the bull "Unigenitus" excited violent agitations in different parts of the kingdom. All the civil and religious orders, without distinction of state or character, protested against it; the cardinal d'Estrées called it the work of the spirit of darkness; the cardinal de Polignac, who did not know of the affiliation of the great king with the Society of Jesus, dared to name it in a mandamus, an abominable work, which a Jesuit alone could conceive. He was punished for this by exile, and a prohibition to appear at court.

Some counsellors of parliament wished also to resist the encroachments of Jesuitism, but the dungeons of Vincennes and the bastille did good and prompt justice to them. France was divided into two parties, the opponents and the acceptants of it. Still, in the faction of the acceptants, composed of the creatures of Father Tellier, there were such divisions, that it was easy to perceive that without a resort to the intimidation employed by the royal disciple of Ignatius Loyola to have the bull accepted, it would have been rejected almost unanimously by the French ecclesiastics.

In the midst of these idle discussions between the opponents and the acceptants, died the celebrated Fenelon, the archbishop of Cambray, the courtier prelate, whom the priests persist in showing to us as the model of every virtue. We think it useful to show how the chancellor d'Aguesseau expresses himself concerning him:—"He is a gossip," says he in his memoirs, "simple and artful, open and deceitful, modest and ambitious, sensitive and indifferent, capable of desiring every thing, and of despising every thing; always agitated, always tranquil; mixing in nothing, taking part in every thing; a Sulpician, a missionary, even a Jesuit and a courtier, all at once; fit to play the most brilliant parts, fit to live in obscurity; competent for all things, and yet still more competent for himself; a versatile genius, who knows how to assume all characters, without ever losing his own, and the bottom of which is a fruitful and graceful imagination."

D'Aguesseau forgot in his portrait some strokes of the pencil, which would have painted this bishop as he was, cowardly, hypocritical, and persecuting; such as he proved himself in a denunciatory memoir addressed to Clement the Eleventh, with the recommendation "to be read privately." He wrote to his holiness:—"Experience has for a long time proved to demonstration, most holy father, that there remains no hope of reducing the Jansenist faction by moderate and mild means. Whilst paternal indulgence suspends the employment of violent remedies, the contagion is propagated without obstacles and with impunity. Belgium is infested by Jansenists, as well as Holland; the elector of Cologne favours the heresy; the court of Vienna is more than suspected of not being opposed to it. This detestable doctrine has insinuated itself every where, in Spain, at Naples, even at Rome; but it is in France that the evil has penetrated the deepest, and that it reigns without an obstacle; the greater part of the bishops and of the religious orders, Dominicans, Carmelites, Augustines, Genovefains, Benedictines, Premontres, Oratorians, Capuchins, Lazarists, are Jansenists, as well as the colleges, schools, the preceptors of the young princes, the princesses, the parliaments, the magistracy, and a great number of prelates. The cardinal de Noailles, archbishop of Paris, is tainted with this error, as are all those who surround him. We must then hasten to find a remedy for so terrible an evil; the time is propitious, we must impose formularies, exact oaths, deprive the refractory of their posts and benefices, excommunicate them, and apply to them all the canonical and temporal penalties to constrain them to abjure. . . ."

This odious information contains not less than twelve pages, and the informer, whilst asking secrecy, takes great pains to designate his enemies by their names; and if he sometimes affects not to name them, he gives such minute indications, that it is impossible not to recognise them.

Whilst the pious Fenelon was carrying on this bitter war against the Jansenists in the dark, he was writing to the ambassador of France at Rome, that he felt neither hatred nor love for either of the two theological parties which were rending the kingdom; which did not prevent him from addressing a memoir a few days afterwards to the duke de Chevreuse, in which he informed him, still under the seal of secrecy, "That he wished to be rid of the theologians of Louvain, who occupied ecclesiastical dignities in his diocese; that he dared not send them away of his own authority, because they were cherished by the faithful, and that in persecuting them he would incur the risk of being stoned; but that he asked it as a favour from the king to order the expulsion of all the priests of Louvain, without even excepting the non-Jansenists, so as to cut short the possibility of employing suspicious persons. He, moreover, besought his majesty to compel the professors of the university of Douay to hand in their resignations, that their employments might be conferred on Jesuits."

A very strange intercourse was established between the archbishop of Cambray and him who was to be his successor, the too famous Abbe Dubois, as appears by a voluminous correspondence, in which Fenelon enters at length upon their agreement in character, a sentiment of profound esteem, and mutual services of high importance which united him to Dubois. It is even supposed that he helped the abbe in his clandestine marriage, from the terms of a letter which he wrote to Madame Rougault, the wife of the intendant of Poitiers, an old associate in Guyonism:—"I recommend to you strongly, madam, the grave and difficult affair which Dubois has in your province, and in which your husband can serve very efficiently this abbe, my best friend for many years, a man who has given me solid and touching marks of attachment, and whose interests are so dear to me, that I shall regard the favours you shall grant him as done to myself."

What will appear still more extraordinary than the intimate friendship, between the archbishop of Cambray and the abbe Dubois, is his affiliation with the Templars. All historians agree in saying that Fenelon was received as a knight of the Temple in 1699, a period at which he was already in possession of his see, and that on the day of his joining the order, he pronounced the usual oath, which contains a full and entire adhesion to the doctrine of pantheism; it is this:—"God is all which exists; each part of that which exists is a part of God, but is not God. Immutable in his essence, God is mutable in his parts, which, after having existed under the laws of certain combinations, more or less complicated, revive under the laws of new combinations. All is uncreated. . . ." Thus, then, Fenelon, that devoted servant of the Holy See, that intrepid defender of pontifical authority, that fierce apostle of Jesuitism, that bitter Catholic, was not even a Christian!

He died at the age of sixty-four years on the 7th of January, 1715, at the time when Louis the Fourteenth, to assure the triumph of the Society of Jesus, was preparing to force parliament to register the edicts which assimilated the refusal to accept the bull "Unigenitus" to heresy, and rendered the guilty liable to be burned. He was also preparing to restore the heated chambers, which, under his predecessors, had put to death so many victims, and he would certainly have executed this criminal design, if death had not delivered France of him.

Under the successor of Louis the Fourteenth, ecclesiastical matters wore an entirely different face; the duke of Orleans, the regent of the kingdom during the minority of the young Louis the Fifteenth, possessed a cynical materialism, and instead of showing the regard for the Jesuits to which the old king had accustomed them, he sought out every opportunity of humbling them. Thus, as soon as he had the exercise of the sovereign authority in his hands, he exiled the most influential members of the society, amongst others, Fathers Tellier and Doucin, who were constantly manœuvring to have the bull "Unigenitus" received.

As the persecutions against the Jansenists had entirely ceased, the ambassador Amelot, who was charged to solicit secretly, at Rome, briefs useful to the Jesuits, finding himself without an official mission, quitted Italy and returned to France, with letters from his holiness for the archbishop of Paris, whom he had restored to favour, and in which the pontiff announced that he was ready, if not to revoke, at least to modify the constitution which had troubled the kingdom. This singular declaration of the holy father surprised the cardinal de Noailles so much, that he could not avoid showing his astonishment to the ambassador. "What!" replied Amelot, "do you know our pope, and yet find his conduct extraordinary? Do you not know that Clement the Eleventh himself avowed to me, that he was never bound by what he had promised, even in writing, since he was frequently obliged to say one thing and do another; and that the truth never escaped his lips."

The prelate was not long in verifying the exactness of the allegations of the ambassador; for at the very time his holiness was giving him assurances of attachment to his person, he was addressing to the regent, in reply to official letters which he had received from him, a brief in which he spoke of the cardinal de Noailles in terms so harsh, that the prince complained of them to the nuncio. As his whole reply, the legate showed him the secret instructions he had received by the same courier, and in which he protested his affection and esteem for the same cardinal, ordered him to seek out his friendship, and to induce him by all possible means to enter into the secrets and plans of the court of Rome. The holy father was then solely occupied with establishing as a principle, his infallibility in matters of religious doctrine, and on political questions, in order to be enabled to contest the monarchy of Sicily with the duke Victor Amadeus, which had fallen to him by the treaties of Utrecht and Rastadt, concluded during the preceding years among the princes who had taken part in the war of the Spanish succession.

Since the peace, Clement the Eleventh had not ceased to lanch warnings, excommunications, and interdicts against Amadeus. But the new king of Sicily, without allowing himself to be disturbed by these hostile manifestations, had prohibited his subjects from publishing any writing from the court of Rome which had not first been examined by competent authority, and had not received the approval necessary for its promulgation. He had, moreover, declared the pontifical interdict abusive, and had rejected the bull fulminated by the pope to reject the old constitution of Urban the Second, which, since the eleventh century, had recognised the kings and queens of Sicily as born legates of the Holy See, and authorised them to regulate, themselves, all the ecclesiastical, spiritual, and temporal affairs, with the assistance of a special tribunal, called the tribunal of monarchy. The royal advocate did not fail to protest against this decree, and to appeal from a pope badly informed, to his successor better informed. The thing was in this condition when the duke of Savoy, tired of his strife with the court of Rome, thought of bargaining his island of Sicily with Austria for other possessions.

The king of Spain, whom these dispositions thwarted very much, interfered in the matter through his minister Alberoni, who then played the first part in the Spanish monarchy. That extraordinary man, who had so many points of resemblance to Cardinal Richelieu, was merely the son of a gardener, of Fiorenzuola, a village of Parmesan. His first employment had been that of bell-ringer in the cathedral of Placenza; his fine figure and sprightliness were remarked by the count of Ronciveri, bishop of St. Donnin, who took him into his service, made him his Ganymede, and then gave him the rank of canon and chaplain. The same compliances had afterwards procured him the favour of the duke of Parma; and as the prince found ability in his minion, he did not disdain to talk with him sometimes of the important affairs of his dutchy, which was the cause of the fortune of Alberoni.

One day the prince having to treat with the duke de Vendome, who commanded the armies of Italy, and not knowing to whom to confide his mission, offered it to the young abbe. The latter accepted it, went to the French camp as the commissary of the duke of Parma, and asked to be admitted to an audience of the general. The duke was so delighted with the new ambassador, that the latter was enabled to gain the cause he came to plead; The duke of Parma was, however, compelled to part with him, and he entered into the service of the French general, whose secretary and favourite he became. From that time he never left his new protector, and accompanied him to Spain when he went to take command of the army sent by Louis the Fourteenth to the aid of Philip the Fifth. On the death of the duke de Vendome, who was poisoned at Vignarez, in the kingdom of Valencia, Alberoni returned to Paris, from whence the duke of Parma sent him, shortly after, on a secret mission to the court of Madrid.

The princess des Ursini, the favourite of Philip the Fifth, then governed the kingdom, and made her authority to be felt so severely, that all the grandees, and even the monarch, were tired of her. Thus it was not difficult for Alberoni to negotiate the marriage of Philip the Fifth with Elizabeth Farnese, the heiress of the dutchess of Parma. The young princess came to Madrid, married the king, and exiled the favourite; and as a recompense to the skilful negotiator of her marriage, she surrendered herself to the former minion of her father, and raised him to the rank of first minister. Alberoni, invested with the confi dence of the sovereign, and in possession of the most elevated post in the kingdom, was not yet satisfied; he wished to govern alone. He used the ascendancy which he exercised over the new queen, insinuated to her that she ought to aspire to replace the princess des Ursini, and to seize on the royal authority in an absolute manner; that to attain this end, she should enervate her husband by voluptuousness, remain constantly with him, prevent even his valets from approaching him, except for indispensable services, and that, above all, she should accustom him never to give audience to any minister but in her presence.

Elizabeth executed the instructions of her lover with the most scrupulous exactitude, and entirely controlled the mind of the stupid Philip the Fifth. But as the young queen was incapable of governing a kingdom, it turned out that it was Alberoni who had in his hands the exercise of the supreme authority. It was not yet enough to have reached the power—he must maintain himself there. The minister was occupied in consolidating his position, and proceeded as Cardinal Richelieu had done, by removing from the court the grandees of the state, and particularly the ecclesiastics, whose perfidious spirit he well knew. He first exiled the bishop Tabarada, the governor of the council of Castile, and prepared his batteries to overthrow the grand inquisitor, the cardinal del Giudice, and Father d'Aubenton, one of the framers of the famous bull "Unigenitus," who was then the confessor of Philip the Fifth; his efforts, however, for the destruction of this Jesuit only served to excite the whole order against him, and to cause the hat of a cardinal, which he solicited, to be refused him.

The prudent Alberoni then changed his tactics; as he regarded it as essential for him to be admitted into the sacred college, as well to strengthen his title as first minister, as to obtain a guarantee of inviolability in case of disgrace, he became reconciled to d'Aubenton, engaged to maintain him in his post of confessor to the king, to abandon to him the whole control of affairs with the Holy See, and not to grant any benefice in Spain without his approval. On his side, the Jesuit promised to serve the minister, to smooth down the obstacles which opposed his elevation to the cardinalate, and to bring the Holy See into his interests. He also engaged to obtain for him the aid of the cardinal Aldovrandi, who had great influence in the sacred college, provided he should ask that he should be appointed nuncio in Spain.

Several favourable circumstances then came to aid the minister, and concurred in assuring his promotion. The Turks, after having conquered the Morea, and gained several victories over the Venetians, threatened Italy with an invasion, which alarmed the pope very much. On the other hand, the emperor of Germany, who still preserved his pretensions to the Spanish peninsula, also announced his intention to establish himself in Italy, to resume with more advantage hostilities against the house of Bourbon. Thus Clement found himself in a most embarrassing position, as he was exposed to the attacks of the Musselmén, or to the evil designs of the imperialists, without being able to claim the aid of any power, Charles the Sixth having signified to him that he was unwilling that a single French or Spanish battalion should pass the Alps, and if they did, he would seize on the states of the church. It only remained for him to solicit vessels and galleys to combat the Turks by sea, whilst the Venetians, united with the Germans, would endeavour to repel them on land. He addressed himself to Spain, whose marine was flourishing, and besought Philip the Fifth to arm a fleet in his defence. Alberoni appeared to listen favourably to the demand of the holy father, and made great preparations to assemble an imposing squadron; at the same time he renewed his request to the court of Rome for the hat of a cardinal. As he was in no hurry to send his fleet to sea, Clement the Eleventh wished to seek other allies, and to form a powerful league against the infidels, of which the emperor of Germany and the czar were to be the heads. He immediately ordered his nuncio Bentivoglio, who resided in Paris, to labour secretly for the realization of this plan; and he himself even addressed a brief to Peter the Great, who was then in the capital of France. His holiness had a double purpose in writing to the autocrat of the north; that of interesting him in the success of a league that he thought necessary for the safety of Rome, and that of leading him to permit the free exercise of the Catholic religion through the whole extent of his dominions. The better to have his desires complied with, Clement had been careful to repeat in his letter all the emphatic titles which the czar took, although the pontiffs, his predecessors, had always refused to give the title of majesty to the dukes of Muscovy. Peter the Great, however, did not appear to attach much importance to this mark of deference by the holy father, for he contented himself with replying, that he would examine into the religious question on his return to St. Petersburg, and that, as to the affair of the league, he could not think of it until he had finished his war with Sweden.

Such promises were of no account to the sovereign pontiff, who wished to obtain prompt and immediate aid; he then turned to Spain, which had armed a formidable fleet, and reopened negotiations with Alberoni. The latter demanded the hat of a cardinal, and announced that the fleet would not sail until the pope had consented to his admission into the sacred college. The holy father, pressed by circumstances, solicited by the cardinal Aldovrandi, Father d'Aubenton, and other Jesuits whom he feared to discontent, opposed only a mild resistance. But events suddenly occurred to overthrow the plans of the minister. The emperor having been informed that the grand inquisitor of Spain had gone to Milan to take part in some political machinations, had him arrested and kept prisoner. Alberoni used this pretended violation of the law of nations, as a pretext to declare war on the empire, and the Spanish squadron sailed at once from the ports of the Mediterranean. Clement the Eleventh suspected then that the minister had taken him for his dupe, and that the fleet had been destined for a long time to attack Naples or Sicily, and swore on the consecrated host that he would never make Alberoni a cardinal.—The oath of a priest! Some days afterwards the nuncio Aldovrandi had so well demonstrated to the pope, that the expedition had sailed to chastise the barbarian pirates, and not to attack Sardinia, nor make an attempt on Naples or Sicily, that he reviewed his former decision, and in full consistory, conferred the title of cardinal on Alberoni, on the 12th of July, 1717. At almost the same moment, the Spaniards, commanded by the marquis of Leda, approached the coast of Sardinia, seized upon Cagliari, and after having left a garrison there, returned to their vessels, and went against Sicily. His holiness, twice tricked by Alberoni, exclaimed treason, and exhausted himself in powerless threats against the Spanish minister. Afterwards, however, the latter was to experience the effects of the hatred of the pontiff.

The approach of a war which threatened to embrace anew all Europe, did not prevent the Jesuits from continuing their intrigues for the acceptance of the constitution "Unigenitus." In France they ruled, thanks to the abbe Dubois, who laboured to merit his hat of cardinal, and who used his influence over the regent to obtain the pure and simple acceptance of the bull. Finally, the infamous abbe, seconded by the nuncio Bentivoglio, extorted from the duke of Orleans a consent, which rendered the constitution obligatory on all the faithful, and enabled the execrable disciples of Loyola to gain their cause over the prelates who wished to defend the liberties of the Gallican church. The Sorbonne, which had recently decreed that the acceptance wrested from the dead king was not obligatory, received orders to stop its session, and saw this decision ratified by a bull of the pope, which declared the doctors stripped of every dignity, until they amended their lives; deprived them of all the privileges which had been delegated to them by his predecessors, and prohibited them from admitting any clerk to the grade of doctor in theology.

Clement then renewed his attacks against the cardinal de Noailles, the head of the council of conscience, and held a general congregation of cardinals to judge the prelate. He pronounced the following discourse on this subject:—"My brethren, we are occupied about a great culprit, the archbishop of Paris, formerly the son of our joy, now the son of our grief. If, however, this child of our predilection had ignorance as an excuse, we would be disposed to pardon him; but no, the servant knew the will of his master and refused to perform it. We have seen him introduced in a criminal letter which he signed with his own hand. Thus, he has condemned himself, and we would be culpable if our love prevented us from punishing him; we are then determined to take the hat of a cardinal from him, for we must reject from the synagogue and the sanhedrim, him who has stood up against the success of the apostle." At the close of the consistory, he published extremely violent briefs against the opposing bishops, in which he declared, "that to seek to interpret the bull 'Unigenitus,' was to desire the fruit of the forbidden tree, and that curiosity should yield to faith."

So much audacity alarmed the regent himself, and induced him to make the parliaments of the kingdom interfere in the quarrel to prevent the Roman rescripts from being admitted into France, unless they were accompanied by letters patent. He moreover encouraged the faculties of theology of Rheims, Nantz, and Caen, to follow the example of that of Paris, to erase the decrees of acceptance, and to appeal from the constitution to a future council, not to interpret it, but to condemn it as bad and contrary to the truth, as overthrowing the faith, destructive to morality, ruinous to ecclesiastical discipline, violating the sacred rights of the episcopate, and annihilating the authority of sovereigns.

This levy of bucklers plunged Clement the Eleventh into an abyss of perplexities. On the one hand he saw from the boldness of his opponents, that all orders in the kingdom sustained them, that the parliaments and the faculties waited but the opportunity to declare against the bull, all the inferior clergy and the people applauded the opposition; on the other side, he perceived that the bishops of his party, and the regent himself, would approve of the act of appeal as soon as they saw that it was universally demanded by the provinces.

To allay the storm and save the pontifical infallibility, Clement wished to temporise; he sent the Jesuit Lafitteau to the cardinal de la Tremouille, who was commissioned by the regent to settle with the court of Rome all questions regarding the bull "Unigenitus," and instructed him to solicit from the duke of Orleans, a declaration by which it should be enjoined on the French bishops neither to speak nor write against the constitution, offering, on these terms, to take no new determinations against its opponents. At the same time, he wrote the following letter to the archbishop of Paris to endeavour to gain him over to his cause, or at least to weaken his resentment:

"To our very dear son Louis Anthony, of the order of St. Marie sur la Minerve, priest of the holy Roman church, Cardinal de Noailles, Clement the Eleventh:

"My dear son, health and the apostolical blessing:

"The sharp thorns which have so long pierced our heart, on account of the resistance of a small number of French bishops to our constitution "Unigenitus," causes us to feel most sensibly, when we reflect on the words of our divine master, which recommend fraternal union to his disciples. Jesus Christ was unwilling that his seamless robe, which, in its allegorical sense, signifies the church, should be divided by those who crucified him; he did no more permit, whatever desire he had to suffer for us, that his bones should be broken on the cross, so as to teach us, that every division, light as it might be, which the mystical bones of his body suffered, which is the clergy, should be sharper for him than the flagellation and punishment of the cross; from which we must infer how much he must condemn that baneful dissension which troubles France, to the contempt of Catholic authority, and to the danger of the destruction of the Christian religion. God knows how often we would have offered to him the sacrifice of our life to appease this horrible tempest, and how often we have carried our prayers to the foot of his throne, to ask that you, our most dear son, would be at length enlightened by his divine light, and that you would recognise that it is time to heal the evils which bad men do in your name, and hinder those with which they still menace the church.

"We conjure you with all possible earnestness, by the holy mysteries instituted on that day of which we celebrate the memory, to be willing to listen to our voice, or rather to the word of Christ himself, who speaks to you by our mouth, and exhorts you paternally to distrust your reason in a matter of so grave importance, to make a generous sacrifice of your own sentiments, to prefer the tranquillity of the church to worldly considerations, to give the example of submission to our constitution, to cover with shame the wicked and heretics who rejoice in our discords. May it please the divine clemency to give a triumphant force to our words, that it may dispose your lordship to diffuse them, and that it may pour into the great church of the flourishing kingdom of France, the treasures of blessings which we desire for it in our apostolical meekness. Given at Rome, in our palace of St. Peter, on Holy Thursday, in the year 1717, and in the seventeenth year of our pontificate."

This letter was handed to the archbishop of Paris by the nuncio, and immediately communicated by the prelate to the council of the regency. It was generally approved of. The duke of Orleans, who hoped that it announced the termination of the theological quarrels, induced the cardinal to raise no obstacle to the peace, and to propose to the holy father an arrangement which should lead the two parties to a reconciliation by means of mutual concessions, promising to act for this purpose on the court of Rome. The archbishop immediately wrote a profoundly respectful letter to Clement, in which, without giving an explicit or implied adhesion to the constitution "Unigenitus," he enumerated at length all the evils which it had produced, and besought him to seek a remedy which should put an end to them. This epistle was presented to his holiness by the cardinal de la Tremouille.

When Clement the Eleventh had read it, he crushed it with rage in his hands, blas-phemed, and turning towards the plenipotentiary of the regent, said to him with concentrated rage, "that it was unnecessary to send so large a volume to announce to him that his bull was rejected." The cardinal replied, that the acceptance by Monseigneur de Noailles, whom he supposed to be the leader of the appellants, would not annihilate an opposition which counted almost all Frenchmen in its ranks; that times had changed since the death of Louis the Fourteenth; that it was imprudent in the holy father to show so much obstinacy in the maintenance of a bull which he well knew to be filled with vicious and erroneous propositions; that the regent would not send its opponents to the bastille, and persecute the clergy, the theologians, and the magistracy, to please the Jesuits; that, finally, it was time to put an end to ridiculous quarrels which endangered the throne. The pope exclaimed against the audacity of the cardinal, declared that he would abate nothing from his pretensions, that he was infallible, and that it was his will that the bull should be received as an article of faith.

His eminence hastened to transmit the result of his negotiations to the regent, who, seeing the impossibility of obtaining the slightest concession from the obstinate pontiff, published a declaration which imposed silence about the constitution on all parties, and caused the court of Rome to be informed of it. Clement the Eleventh at first pronounced it outrageous, raged against the duke of Orleans, threatened France with his thunders, and called down all the curses of heaven upon the nation. Then, after some remarks of the cardinal de la Tremouille, he softened down wonderfully, and discovering that he had to fear lest the regent should exact forcibly what was refused to his diplomatic agents, he announced that he consented to enter into arrangements.

When the conditions of the treaty were discussed, the pope avowed that he had yielded only to the solicitations of the Jesuits, and had granted the bull "Unigenitus," but at the pressing solicitations of the dead king, and on the payment to him of some millions; he only asked them to double the sum for its revocation. The exactions of the sovereign pontiff not having been admitted, all agreement was broken off, and things remained on their former footing. Clement immediately seized skilfully on the pretext of a publication of an appeal, fabricated in the name of the cardinal de Noailles, by the Jesuits, to assemble a congregation, and to have the apochryphal act condemned at the same time, with the act of appeal before drawn up by the French bishops. In his new bull, "Pastoralis officii," he was not content with fulminating his anathemas against the clergy and laity, who refused to adhere to the constitution "Unigenitus," he even enjoined on the faithful to have no communication with the rebels, who disguised their heresy and their sophism under the name of opponents, and declared as separate from the communion of the Catholic and Roman church, those who contravened his orders.

On the appearance of this bull, the nation was moved, the universities assembled, and protested energetically against the pretensions of the Holy See; the parliament did not remain behind the schools, and published a decree against it. The cardinal de Noailles, supported by the chapter of Notre Dame at Paris, launched a new appeal against this second bull, and the constitution "Unigenitus," declaring that Clement the Eleventh violated the most essential rights of the episcopate, destroyed the fundamental maxims of the Gallican liberties, attacked the laws of discipline, and sowed the seeds of trouble in church and state.

Though beaten down by this explosion of hatred, the Jesuits were not conquered; the imminence of the common danger brought them closer together, and they appeared to be more formidable than ever. They drew into their party the infamous Abbe Dubois, the purveyor of the regent, who aspired to play in the state the part of Richelieu or of Mazarin, and who wished, after their example, to obtain the hat of cardinal. This venerable personage offered to the duke of Orleans his mediation in the matter, and engaged to terminate the discussions to his entire satisfaction. The end of the abbe was to use the Jesuit Lafitteau, the secret agent of the Holy See, to bring about an arrangement between the court of Rome and the regent, reserving for himself, as his reward, his entrance into the sacred college. But the end proved that he had counted too much on the influence Father Lafitteau had over Clement; notwithstanding the entreaties and the pressing messages of the Jesuit, his holiness refused to relax from his rigour, and even caused a pastoral instruction of the cardinal de Noailles, to be condemned by the inquisition at Rome, which embittered the opponents very much.

Clement the Eleventh preserved no more restraint in his intercourse with Spain than with France; the disgust which he felt at having had the hat of a cardinal extorted from him by the minister of Philip the Fifth, led him from his habitual policy, and induced him to thwart the political plans of Alberoni. The end of the latter, in his war with the empire, was to assure the sovereignty of Naples, Sicily, and the ports of Tuscany, to the king of Spain, and the consent of the other powers, that the estates of the grand duke and of the dutchy of Parma, should go as a heritage to one of the sons of Philip the Fifth, in case these princes died without heirs. He proposed as a recompense to divide the territory of Mantua; to give one part to the duke of Guastalla and the other to the Venetians; he offered to grant the Milanese and Montferrat whole to the emperor, to yield Sardinia to the duke of Savoy, for Sicily, preserving to him the title of king; finally, to restore Commachio to the court of Rome.

Not content with refusing his consent to these arrangements, the holy father sought to excite France, Holland and England against Spain, and caused it to be signified to Philip the Fifth, in the name of these three powers, that they would invade his kingdom if the queen persisted in maintaining the cardinal Alberoni in power. This threat had no influence on the king of Spain; the cardinal minister preserved the supreme authority, and regulated as before the destinies of Europe. Alberoni had even the impudence to solicit from the court of Rome, as if nothing extraordinary had occurred between him and Clement the Eleventh, bulls of investiture for the bishopric of Malaga, and the archbishopric of Seville, which had been given him by his Catholic majesty. On the refusal of the sovereign pontiff to acquiesce in his request, he referred it to the council of Castile, which was entirely composed of his creatures, and obtained an order enjoining on the pope to send the bulls of investiture speedily, if he did not wish to be constrained to do so by force of arms.

Clement made no reply, and maintained his first refusal; the minister, rendered furious by the silence of the court of Rome, determined to strike a great blow, in order to give a lesson to the pope, he said; and to teach him not to forget the respect which was due to a cardinal, he sent an order to the apostolic nuncio to leave Madrid. Before obeying, the cardinal Aldovrandi asked, and obtained permission to communicate with the Holy See, to make a last effort in favour of peace; the legate, who was strongly attached to his nuncioship, on account of the great profits he derived from it, sent a message to the pope, and pointed out to him, in his correspondence, all the motives which should induce him to desire peace with Spain; he even insinuated to him, that if he persisted in refusing to grant the bulls asked by the council of Castile, he might fear lest the Spanish troops, who were in Italy, might make an advance towards Rome. None of these considerations could change the determination of Clement. He wrote to the cardinal Aldovrandi not to quit the capital, and he would charge himself with the rest; and the same courier who had borne the despatches from the legate, brought back to Alberoni, who was then at Balsain with the court, a brief from his holiness relating the order enjoined on the cardinal Aldovrandi to remain in Spain. The minister seeing his authority openly braved, resolved to act with vigour; he started immediately to Madrid, went to the palace of the nuncio, closed it, set guards on the legate to prevent him from leaving it, and sent an order to the cardinal Aquaviva, the ambassador of his Catholic majesty to Clement the Eleventh, to leave the states of the church, and inform his holiness that an army would enter Italy to attack Rome, if he did not immediately apologise.

Nothing could move the pontiff; he replied to the Spanish cardinal that he was about to disgrace Alberoni from his dignity of prince of the church, as guilty of rebellion towards the Holy See, and without troubling himself, he allowed the ambassador to depart for Spain. The great confidence of the pope arose from his having been informed by Father d'Aubenton, who had a short time before rejoined his party, that the credit of the minister was daily diminishing, and that the queen, lanced into new intrigues, paid scarcely any attention to her old lover, who was in some sort under the control of Laura, her nurse, and the go-between in her debauchery. His holiness had arranged his plans accordingly; thanks to a large sum of money, he had bought the nurse into his interests, and counted on the disgrace of the favourite before he could put his plans in execution. It so turned out; Queen Elizabeth, overreached by her confidant, determined to rid herself of a lover who had become importunate, and one morning the first minister received orders to quit Madrid in twenty-four hours, and the kingdom in fifteen days. Alberoni, driven from Spain, was obliged to wander about, under a feigned name, to avoid the poinards of the satellites of the Holy See; at length, tired of his wandering life, he determined to fix his residence at Sestri di Levante, in the territory of Genoa, where he underwent new persecutions from Clement the Eleventh, and even from Philip the Fifth.

This success emboldened the pope, and gave him such confidence in his political skill, that he supposed no one could resist him; he even dared to make an effort with the emperor of Russia, to bring about the reunion of the Greek and Roman churches. But the czar Peter, who did not think of bowing his head beneath the yoke of a priest, drove off the legates he sent to him, and to take away from the pontiffs all hopes of extending their influence into Russia, he determined to give the people of his capital the spectacle of the enthronement of a pope; he chose one of his buffoons, named Joseph, to play this part, and had him promenaded through the streets of St. Petersburg with a fool, who represented a popess, in the midst of the most burlesque ceremonies.

Clement the Eleventh perceived that he had presumed too much on his influence; he abandoned his plans of converting Russia, and fell back on France, which he continued to trouble with new claims until the time of his death, which took place on the 19th of March, 1721. Pasquin made his funeral eulogy in two lines: "Rome rejoice, thou art delivered from that pope who promised much, performed but little, and wept all the time."

INNOCENT THE THIRTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SECOND POPE.

[A. D. 1721.]

Funeral of Clement the Eleventh—Alberoni comes to Rome to concur in the election—Intrigue of Michael Angelo Conti—He signs a promise to give the hat to the abbé Dubois—His exaltation—Dubois, the first minister of the regent, purchases the hat of a cardinal—Nepotism of Innocent the Thirteenth—Tergiversation of the pope in the affair of the Quesmellists—The abbe Tencin and the holy father—Sickness of the sovereign pontiff—He sells permission to Louis the Fifteenth to breakfast before communion—Quarrel between the Holy See and the empire—Alberoni is absolved from all the accusations brought against him during the preceding pontificate—Persecutions by the Jesuits in China of the legate Mezzabarba—Innocent the Thirteenth announces that he is about to reform the Society of Jesus—He dies poisoned.

As soon as Clement the Eleventh had closed his eyes, the cardinal camerlingue discharged the functions of his office; he called the dead pope three times, according to usage, and receiving no reply, he approached the body with the cardinal grand master of the chamber, took the ring of the fisherman, and then ordered all the bells of the city to be rung, to announce to the faithful that the pope had finished his reign. On the next day the mortal remains of Clement the Eleventh were borne to the Quirinal palace in the Vatican, and from thence to the church of St. Peter, where, for nine days, solemn offices were celebrated for the repose of his soul.

Whilst the funeral ceremonies were proceeding, the cardinals who aspired to the papacy set to work to secure votes. As at this time no voice was to be disdained, several competitors recollected that Alberoni dwelt in the territory of Genoa, and wrote to him to come and take part in the conclave, although judicial proceedings had been then commenced to deprive him of the purple. He yielded to the urgency of his colleagues, went to Rome without show or noise, in his own carriage, and was received in the conclave with the honours usually rendered to the princes of the church.

All the cardinals being seated, according to their rank, in the Sistine chapel, the balls which regulated the order of the elections were read in a loud voice, then each swore to observe the constitutions which rendered the property of the Holy See inalienable. After this ceremony the ballot was opened, and the intrigues commenced among the different competitors.

For a month the balance was suspended between the three principal factions, the French, the Italian, and the Spaniard; finally, it inclined to the side of Cardinal Michael Angelo Conti, who had brought Alberoni into his party, by promising him to put an end to the persecutions against him, and who had also attached the cardinal de Rohan to his cause, by engaging in writing to give the hat to Dubois, the prime minister of France. There were still struggles and skirmishes for ten or eleven days, but the money of France rendered the most obstinate docile, and on the 8th of May, 1721, the cardinal Michael Angelo Conti, was proclaimed sovereign pontiff.

After the ceremonies of the exaltation, the abbe Tencin, who was the creature of Dubois and the secret agent of the regent at the court of Rome, summoned the new pope to keep the promise he had made to the cardinal de Rohan, and to elevate the favourite of Philip of Orleans to the rank of a prince of the church.

His holiness, who justly feared to excite a general discontent by appointing as cardinal a man so infamous as Dubois, wished to review his promise, and argued from the necessity in which he was placed of retarding the promotion. The abbe Tencin who had received orders to hasten the conclusion of this affair, threatened to publish the secret engagement given to the cardinal de Rohan, and which invalidated the election of the pope as simoniacal; he besides offered to the holy father eight millions of francs, in exchange for a simple act of compliance. Innocent yielded to such powerful reasoning and signed the promotion of Dubois.

The panegyrists of the holy father seek to excuse this guilty action, by representing it as a weakness, by showing that he distributed the money among his two brothers, the duke de Poli and Monsignor Conti, Benedictine monks, his two sisters, the one the widow of the duke of Aquasparta, the other the wife of the prince Ruspoli, and his five nephews or nieces.

It was supposed that in his conduct, he would be a faithful continuer of the policy of his predecessors, and that he would maintain the bull "Unigenitus;" but it turned out the reverse, as he showed himself favourable to the appellants, either from a secret engagement with the cardinal de Rohan, who was hostile to its supporters, or from his hatred to the Jesuits, who were becoming daily more formidable. His holiness entered into communication with the cardinal de Noailles, and addressed a brief to him to engage him to turn his attention to devising means which should put an end to the troubles which the Jesuits, Louis the Fourteenth, and Clement the Eleventh, had excited and sustained for so many years in the kingdom.

Unfortunately, this first step failed in its effect, in consequence of the precipitation of the opponents themselves. Seven bishops of the party, finding themselves sustained by the head of the church, thought that victory was assured to them; they preserved no restraint in the manifestations of their joy, and wrote a letter in which they attacked violently the bull "Unigenitus" in its fundamentals and form, laid it down as a principle, that a pope had no right to promulgate a constitution without the consent of the cardinals, and blamed the dead pontiff sharply, for having proceeded to the condemnation of Father Quesnel, without the approval of the archbishop of Paris.

This imprudent letter, which was printed and distributed, made so much noise, that the pope found himself constrained to hand it over to the congregation of the holy office, if he did not wish to be regarded as a Quesnellist. It was condemned by a decree, as containing several propositions injurious to the Catholic prelates of France, to the memory of Clement the Eleventh, and the Holy Apostolic See.

The abbe Tencin, the secret agent of the regent, continued to dwell at Rome, and to give cause for scandal, by the most shameful excesses, when he took the singular fancy to be made a cardinal. As he had not surrendered to the holy father, the promise written, when in the conclave, with his own hand, to promote Dubois, he impudently offered to the pope to traffic it against a hat. At such an overture Innocent could not restrain a movement of indignation; he replied to the diplomatic spy, that he could not accede to his demand; that the nomination of the favourite of the regent had already made him enough enemies; that he could, however, excuse himself for that fault, by the pressing solicitations of the French government, and the recommendation of the emperor; but that he had no reason to allege for the promotion of an abbe who had no dignities, titles, nor avowed functions; who was only known at Rome for his excessive immorality, and in France for his incests with his sister, and the renown of an infamous trial.

Tencin retired covered with confusion, without, however, having renounced his plan; he returned to the charge some days afterwards, insisted, threatened, and so beset the holy father, that the latter, tormented by the idea that in a moment all Europe, informed of his shameful bargain with the cardinal de Rohan, would withdraw from their obedience to him, and on the other side, recoiling before the accomplishment of a fresh outrage, fell into a kind of black melancholy, which was very injurious to his health.

These grave subjects of contrarieties did not, however, prevent Innocent from attending to the temporal affairs of the church. The movement of the imperial armies in Italy, and the disembarkation of some Spanish troops, appeared to announce that hostilities were about to recommence between the two parties. The pope did not allow himself to be governed by appearances; he perceived that this display of forces was only to compel him to decide in the affair of the investiture of the kingdom of Naples. To prevent a disagreement, he was beforehand with them, and announced that he was willing to give entire satisfaction to the court of Vienna, and that he was ready to receive the white hackney and the purse of five thousand ducats of gold, which composed the annual tribute paid by the kingdom of Naples to the Holy See. He also took care to press the ceremony of the investiture, that the emperor Charles the Sixth, might send a fleet to sea, and attend to the defence of the island of Malta, which was threatened by the Turks. The pope also wished to interest the other Catholic princes in a kind of crusade against the Sublime Porte, and addressed briefs to all the courts of Europe, to obtain contributions in troops, vessels, and especially money.

France was then engaged in preparations for the coronation of Louis the Fifteenth, and the minister Dubois had asked from the court of Rome for authority for the young monarch to breakfast before communing, that he might be the better enabled to support the fatigue of this long ceremony. His holiness took advantage of the circumstance, and sold this ridiculous dispensation for several millions. The attention which Innocent showed not to confide the conduct of the war against the Turks exclusively to Charles the Sixth, showed that he was endowed with a rare sagacity, and had foreseen what was about to happen; for scarcely had the emperor received the investiture of the kingdom of Naples, than he wished to put himself in the stead and place of the sovereign pontiff, and gave the investiture of Parma and Placenza to the infant Don Carlos, under the pretext that these provinces were mere fiefs of the empire. The court of Rome loudly demanded the rights it claimed over these states; but neither sovereign troubled himself about their claims, and the threats as well as the prudence of the holy father were insufficient to prevent this usurpation of power.

Alberoni then occupied the attention of Europe by his quarrels with the court of Spain; tired of being the object of the persecutions of his old master, the deceitful Philip the Fifth, he himself demanded that the pope should try him; he appeared before the assembly of cardinals, defended himself from all the accusations brought against him, and obtained a brief of absolution.

This bull contained, in substance, that Alberoni was not guilty of any of the accusations brought before the cardinals by the Spanish monarch and Clement the Eleventh; that in consequence his holiness imposed perpetual silence on those who had taken steps against him, abolished all the censures inflicted on him, washed him from the spots cast upon his purple without its being necessary for him to justify himself farther from the accusations and proceedings brought against him, and willed that he should in future enjoy all his prerogatives and dignities as a prince of the church.

Some days afterwards another event, whose result was to be fatal to the sovereign pontiff, occurred to distract men's minds. The legate Mezzabarba, sent into China to abolish the worship of Confucius, returned to Rome and rendered an account to the society of the propaganda of the persecutions to which he had been subjected by the Jesuits. He related in full detail the abominations of which the Jesuits were guilty, and the idolatries which they authorised. He formally accused them of the death of the unfortunate Cardinal de Tournon, and of their efforts to corrupt and intimidate him. All these things appeared so serious to Innocent, that notwithstanding his fear of discontenting the Jesuits, he announced his intention to issue edicts for the reform of the society, and as a first step prohibited them from receiving adepts. The good fathers apparently submitted, and laboured in the dark to rid themselves of the pontiff. The work was finally accomplished. Innocent the Thirteenth died in the midst of frightful convulsions, which detached his intestines, and caused them to fall into the scrotum.

BENEDICT THE THIRTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-THIRD POPE.

[A. D. 1724.]

Election of Benedict the Thirteenth—Origin of the holy father—Nicholas Cascia, one of his domestics, governs the church in his name—Attempt to reform the clergy and the religious orders—The pope reigns but does not govern—He shows himself favourable to the appellants—Correspondence between the pope and the cardinal de Noailles—The Jesuits become more formidable than ever—Intrigues of Fleury, the bishop of Prejus and instructor of Louis the Fifteenth, to obtain the hat of a cardinal—The duke de Bourbon the minister, and his mistress, the marchioness de Prié, become the instruments of the Jesuits—Quarrels about the twelve articles—Council of the Lateran—Plan of the pope to reunite the four Christian communions—The pope in tutelage—Fleury prime minister of France—Condemnation of an octogenarian prelate—The inhabitants of the canton of Luzerne drive the Jesuits from their territory—Journey of the holy father to Beneventum—He puts forth a bull in favour of the Dominicans, and condemns the constitution "Unigenitus"—Intrigues of the Jesuits—Peace between the courts of Rome and Turin—Divisions between the Holy See and the king of Portugal—Consultation of fifty French advocates—Remorse and death of the cardinal de Noailles—The bull "Unigenitus" is definitely accepted in France—Triumph of the Jesuits—Legend concerning Gregory the Seventh—Death of Benedict the Thirteenth.

When the funeral of Innocent the Thirteenth was over, the cardinals entered into conclave and formed several factions to elect a new pontiff to the throne of the apostle

The cardinal Olivieri, one of the gentlemen ushers, intrigued with so much address in behalf of Peter Francis Orsini, the candidate of the Italian party, that he gained a majority of the votes for him, and he was proclaimed pope by the name of Benedict the Thirteenth. He was a monk of the order of St. Dominic, of a character so detestable, that, according to the report of Father Cloche, the general of the order, he resembled a club of acacia, pointed, hard, and crooked. He was, moreover, regarded as the most stupid of the members of the sacred college. But he had the merit in the eyes of the ambitious, who desired to supplant him, of being more than seventy-five years old, and of feeble health.

Historians who have written about this pontiff say, that he embraced the monastic life in his earliest youth, and was not long in making a brilliant fortune in the ecclesiastical career, through the influence of his father, the duke of Bassiano, of the family of the Ursini; that he successively obtained the sees of Manfredonia, Cesena, the archbishopric of Beneventum, and, finally, the title of cardinal. What most distinguished Benedict the Thirteenth, was an absolute incapacity for business, so that on the very day of his exaltation, he announced to the sacred college, that he would discharge the government of the church through one of his old domestics, Nicholas Coscia, whom he had made his major domo, and whom he afterwards raised to the dignity of cardinal, and the archbishopric of Beneventum.

From the very commencement of his reign he was animated by the most laudable intentions. He announced that he was desirous of introducing salutary reforms among the clergy, as well as among Christian societies; and to put his plans in execution, he instituted a congregation, which held several sessions under his presidency. Unfortunately, the cardinals, who made a part of the assembly, and who were interested in the maintenance of abuses, adroitly thrust aside all the propositions which were submitted to them, and employed the sessions in the discussion of very insignificant decrees, one of which prohibited the clergy from wearing wigs, and another condemned public girls, who were enjoined to confine their residence without the gates of the holy city. Coscia, whom these reforms threatened in his dearest interests, in the sale of employments, benefices, annates, indulgences, and absolutions, and who dreaded to see the source of his disgraceful profits dried up, took care to dissuade the pope from changing any thing.

His holiness, for a long time habituated to see only with the eyes of his minister, and to follow his counsels, abandoned his generous intentions, and threw himself into theological questions. It is maintained that the high favour which Coscia enjoyed with his master, arose from a pleasant farce which the latter had played off in the beginning of the reign of Benedict. The good pope had several times been informed of his licentious conduct, his intrigues with courtezans, and had threatened him with disgrace if he were assured of it. One morning the minister had the holy father warned, that he was shut up in a secret chamber of the palace with one of his mistresses. Benedict was immediately conducted to the designated apartment, to surprise the culprit, and to drive him off. Having arrived at the threshold of the door and hearing no noise, he stopped, looked through the key-hole, and saw his secretary on his knees before a crucifix; he then saw him rise, take a discipline, and strike himself heavy blows with it. The pope, duped by this jugglery, would never afterwards listen to any accusation against the pious Coscia. The latter greatly abused his simplicity; he placed no bound to the excesses of his private life, controlled the mind of the pontiff entirely, and remained absolute master, to govern at his will the spiritual and temporal affairs of the church.

Benedict the Thirteenth reigned but in name; his old valet became the true depository of the spiritual and temporal authority; and if he sometimes permitted him to play his part of pope, it was but in questions of theology, which he regarded as too absurd, and altogether unworthy of him. Thus he submitted to him the letter which the cardinal de Noailles wrote to his holiness congratulating him on his exaltation, and expressing the hope he entertained, in regard to the cessation of the quarrels excited by the constitution "Unigenitus."

The pope received the message of the archbishop of Paris favourably, and replied to him in ambiguous terms, which made him hope he would take the part of the appellants against the Jesuits, if the clergy of France consented to make some concession. In this supposition Monseigneur de Noailles drew up, with the approval of the opposing bishops, a memoir which contained twelve propositions on doctrine and ecclesiastical discipline; he immediately sent it to the court of Rome, to have it approved by the sacred college, promising, in exchange, to cause the bull "Unigenitus" to be received in the kingdom. Benedict appointed a committee to examine the twelve propositions and make a report to him. After a conference of three months, the committee reported to him, that the articles proposed for his verification had no need of approval, since they were the expression of evangelical doctrines and were not contested by any one; that the cardinal de Noailles ought to accept the bull "Unigenitus" purely and simply, revoke his appeal, and disavow generally all that he had written and done against the constitution, and expressly to condemn his pastoral instruction. This decision, which placed the friends of the constitution and its opponents on their former ground, without giving the slightest satisfaction to the latter, showed plainly that the Jesuits had resumed their empire at the court of Rome. Moreover, there could no longer be a doubt about it, when Benedict the Thirteenth, or rather his infamous minister, suspended the inquires of the society of the propaganda into the affair of the Chinese worship, and exiled the legate Mezzabarba, the same whom his predecessor wished to appoint a prince of the church, as a recompense for the courage which he had shown in his dangerous mission. The cause of this change arose from the Jesuits having brought the cardinal Coscia into their interests, by opening to him their treasury, and permitting him to draw his hands full out of it.

In France, especially since the death of the regent, their credit had revived, and they were more powerful than ever. The duke of Bourbon, then prime minister, his mistress, the marchioness de Prie, as well as Monseigneur de Fleury, bishop of Frejus, and preceptor to the king, were all entirely devoted to them, and did their best to aid them to triumph. The stupid duke of Bourbon, who was called monsieur the duke, pushed his fanaticism so far as to lanch against the protestants a decree, which prohibited the most secret exercise of the reformed religion under penalty of death, and which declared the memory of those who expired without receiving the sacraments, infamous.

The parliaments were cowardly enough to register this tyrannical edict, whose clauses, in some particulars, excelled the odious ordinances of Louis the Fourteenth; and the attacks against the Quesnellists resumed a new intensity. The opposing bishops defended themselves vigorously, accused the Holy See of bad faith, and furnished, as a proof of it, the refusal to approve of the twelve propositions, which the pope himself had indicated in his correspondence with the archbishop of Paris, as a sufficient modification of the bull "Unigenitus;" they even published the secret letters of the pope, with commentaries on the twelve articles, which overthrew all the doctrines of the constitution "Unigenitus." Fleury obtained a decree of the council of state against the work, providing that it should be suppressed, and that the copies already distributed, should be handed in and torn up by the public executioner.

The excess of rigour which was employed towards the twelve propositions, was the more incomprehensible, since a committee of cardinals had declared them to be holy and orthodox; but the better to cause the conduct of the supporters of Jesuitism to be appreciated, we give the text of these remarkable articles:

1st. Since the sin of Adam no one can acquire true justice or eternal safety, without faith in the Redeemer, more or less developed and distinct, according to the difference in times and persons.

2d. The law of Moses did not give by its own virtue, the grace which is essentially necessary to accomplish the commands of God.

3d. No one resists the absolute will of God.

4th. In the state of fallen nature, in order that the free will of man be deemed to sin or to merit, it is not necessary that there should be an equal aptitude for good or evil, nor that one should find in his will equal force for these two desires.

5th. We may maintain, without error, that the blind and the hardened are sometimes deprived of all inward grace, as a punishment for preceding sins; but it would be condemnable to advance that a man deprived of all grace, can commit the most enormous sins, and the greatest impurities without being guilty before God.

6th. The capital and most essential point of the Christian religion is the divine commandment of the love of God; and this commandment is distinguished from others.

7th. The affinity of all our actions to God is from precept, and not alone from council, and it is not enough that our actions tend to him by implication.

8th. He who commits mortal sins offends God, though he is ignorant of the commands of God, or though he is not actually thinking of him, or though he does not do an express action through the malice of sin.

9th. Those do not follow the sure way of safety, who do not ask in the sacrament of penance, the same love of God, which the second council of Orange and the council of Trent demand from adults, in order to be justified in the sacrament of baptism.

10th. It is a conduct in conformity with the precept of the gospel, and the rules of the church to withhold the benefit of absolution from penitents who are charged with very great or public crimes; or from those who are in the habit, or even in the near occasion of mortal sins; from those who refuse to be reconciled sincerely with their enemies, to restore the property they have taken from their neighbour, either of honour or reputation, and to repair the scandal which they have voluntarily caused by their irregularities or their calumnies.

11th. Holy reading is, without doubt, useful in itself, it is not, however, absolutely necessary for all men without exception, and every one is not permitted to interpret according to his fancy, by following his own mind as his rule, nor to read without preserving the respect and obedience due to pastors, or without a sincere submission to the church, which alone is the judge of the true sense and proper interpretation of scripture.

12th. If any sentence of excommunication clearly prohibits the exercise of acts of true virtue, or diverts from a true precept, it ought at once to be regarded as null and unjust, and that in conformity with the most sacred decrees of the church.

The persecutions recommenced against the opponents of the bull, to force them to receive it without modification; Fleury, who aspired to the cardinalate, wished to prove his zeal, and persecuted the monks of the Chartreuse at Paris, who had been denounced to him as Quesnellists by the Sulpicians; twenty-six of these solitaires were obliged to burst the doors of their cells, and escape from their convent to shun the hatred of their enemies; they took refuge in Holland, from whence they protested against the execrable tyranny of the Holy See.

To render to each the justice which is his due, we will say that these rigorous acts were prescribed by cardinal Coscia, and not by Benedict the Thirteenth, who always showed a disposition to sustain the Jansenists rather than the Jesuits. The pontiff was only guilty in having placed his confidence in a minister who abused it to do evil. Still, we must give as an excuse for his negligence, that he was entirely absorbed in the approach of the jubilee of the first quarter of the century.

As usual pilgrims flocked to Rome, increased the treasures of the Vatican, and carried away, in exchange for their money, indulgences, absolutions, scapularies, rosaries, relics, consecrated rings, and all the trifles which are found in the shop of the pope.

During the following year, Benedict the Thirteenth opened, in the church of St. John of the Lateran, a council at which thirty-two cardinals and fifty-two prelates assisted. His holiness had convened this assembly to regulate some very important points of ecclesiastical discipline and of the liturgy; but the fathers, who were most of them affiliated with the Jesuits or sold to the society, instead of occupying themselves with the questions which were submitted to them, employed their sessions in haranguing about the bull "Unigenitus," and decided that it should be maintained complete. It was in vain that the pope wished to interpose his authority, and claim the benefits of pontifical infallibility; the prelates went on and caused him to affix his signature to the foot of their decrees, by abusing his good faith, and gliding in this important piece among other papers which the secretary of the synod was ordered to place before him each day for his signature.

A Dominican, who assisted at the conferences, wrote a very energetic letter to his superior, in which he thus expresses himself concerning the proceedings in the assembly of St. John of the Lateran:—"You will know, my venerable father, that acts have occurred at Rome which merit the just reprobation of the heretics. A pope, pious and full of good intentions, assembles his prelates to produce a reform in the morals of the clergy, and in the doctrines of a corrupt society; he has the authority in his hand; all who form the synod declare that he is the mouth of truth. What now happens? The Molinists have triumphed over St. Augustine, St. Thomas and grace; they reformed the length of wigs and the cut of clothes, without deciding any thing about the licentiousness of prelates, or still more about the ill regulated morals of the Italian clergy. What consequences can the heretics draw from this? That there is nothing to hope from councils, in which astuteness and fraud usually take the place of the Holy Spirit."

Benedict the Thirteenth was not discouraged by the ill success of the synod of the Lateran; he did not abandon his idea of pacifying the church, and meditated the idea of a universal council, in order to fuse together all the Christian communions by reuniting the four principal sects of Christendom, the Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Calvinists, and Greek Christians. He proposed to put this magnificent plan into execution, by acting in concert with these four churches, and by indicating œcumenical assemblies, which were to be presided over by prelates of the different communions in the cities of Rome, Lubeck, London, and the capital of Livonia.

His holiness had drawn up a programme of the sessions, indicating the measures to be taken to annihilate the schisms; he wished the fathers to make, in common, a new translation of the Bible with explanatory notes, as well as a universal catechism; he consented that the mass should be transformed in the service of the liturgy, that convents should be changed into schools, that the marriage of priests should be permitted on certain conditions, that the worship of images should be entirely modified, and the ecclesiastical discipline established on a uniform basis for all the ministers of religion.

The sovereign pontiff justified this enterprise by saying, that in the temple at Jerusalem, which was the type of the heavenly Jerusalem, there were several approaches to the Holy of Holies, which, in his opinion, was an unanswerable proof that there were several ways to reach heaven. Unfortunately he could not realise this holy work; the Jesuits cried out scandal, made the cardinal Coscia interfere, and the poor pope, who had then attained his seventy-eighth year, was constrained to bind himself by an oath, and on his knees before his old valet, to abandon his pious design, and to promise on the host not to abdicate the tiara. As a reward for his submission, the minister permitted him to go to Beneventum, whither he had long wished to go, to repose from the bustle of business.

The fatal influence of the disciples of Ignatius Loyola was felt in France as well as in Italy; the bishop of Frejus, Fleury, had supplanted the duke de Bourbon in the post of prime minister, and purchased the hat of a cardinal by the price of the most cowardly concessions. He even associated himself with Senein, become archbishop of Embrun in the persecutions which he carried on against the bishop of Senex, his suffragan, one of the appellant bishops, who was an octogenarian; this worthy ecclesiastic was accused of having published, in a mandamus, propositions analogous to those of the famous book of Quesnel, and even to the works of Arnaud, Nicole and Pascal.

Fleury did not blush to persecute a venerable old man, who had passed his life in the exercise of the most sublime virtues, and to be anxious for his fall, in order to assure the triumph of the archbishop of Embrun, the worthy rival of Dubois, whose turpitudes were an object of scandal for the faithful. At the instigation of the Sulpicians, his ordinary counsellors in civil and religious affairs, the minister determined to give great lustre to the condemnation of the bishop of Senex. As the Jansenists continued to demand a synod, he thought of offering to them the phantom of an ecclesiastical assembly, and convened in a provincial council, by a letter de cachet, the most ardent supporters of the bull.

The assembly held its sessions in the palace of the archbishop of Embrun, and under his presidency; therefore, the appellants designated this meeting by the name of the "Brigandage of Embrun." These wretched supporters of Satan were unwilling even to hear the justification of the venerable prelate; they declared him guilty of outrage, sedition and heresy; they interdicted him from his episcopal functions, and exiled him to the mountains of Auvergne, where he died shortly after of chagrin, misery, and some historians say, of poison. This brilliant victory procured for the archbishop of Embrun the hat of a cardinal, that emblem of infamy, and the constant object of his ambition.

Whilst the members of the clergy, the doctors of the Sorbonne, and the counsellors of parliament were submitting disgracefully to the yoke of the Jesuits, the magistrates of the small canton of Luzerne had the courage to expel them from their territory, and to brave the formidable society.

Benedict the Thirteenth remained an entire stranger to these quarrels, and contented himself with making excursions into the province of Beneventum. It is related that he was met in his walk one day by a woman who passed for a prophetess in the country, and who made this singular address to him, "Holy father, I come in the name of God to announce that Rome is thy true church, thy city, the place of thy canonical residence, and not Beneventum. Return then to the Vatican, and remember that thou shouldst obey neither the Jesuits, nor the infamous cardinal Coscia."

The sovereign pontiff listened graciously to the prophetess, promised to follow her advice rigorously, and gave her his blessing. He, however, remained several months longer at Beneventum, and occupied himself with consecrating churches and performing miracles.

Quirini, archbishop of Corfu, maintains that he did three very remarkable things; that he restored sight to a young girl of twelve years of age; that he delivered a woman who was horribly possessed by a devil, and that he cured an infant of five years old, which was lame and dumb from its birth.

He then made preparations to return to Rome, and announced that he was about to publish two bulls, the one on free predestination and efficacious grace, the other upon the constitution "Unigenitus." As he distrusted his natural weakness, he wished to finish these two matters, before setting foot in the holy city, and stopped at the monastery of Monte Cassino, where Monsignor Accoramboni and Father Mola, attorney general of the Dominicans, drew up the bulls. The pope was so satisfied with the labour of these two theologians, that he made them a rich present on his departure for Sezza, and during the journey he caused the two pieces to be read over to him several times by Bishop Fini, who accompanied him in his carriage.

This prelate, who was connected with the society of the Jesuits, was thunderstruck by this discovery, but concealed his astonishment. That same evening he sent a courier to Father Corradini, a Jesuit, and the brother of a cardinal, to inform him of what was going on. The news was immediately transmitted to the general. The most active members of the order were hurried off, some to the cardinals of their party, others to the ministers of the different powers, in order to embitter all the sacred college and the ambassadors against the holy father.

The cardinals Lezcarri, Polignac, and Benivoglio, went immediately to his holiness to prevent the publication of his bulls. The pope stood firm, and would make no concession. Nicholas Coscia came in his turn, sought to change his resolution, prayed and threatened, and, notwithstanding his urgency, gained only half a victory. Benedict consented to modify the bull concerning the constitution "Unigenitus;" but in that which consecrated the theory of the Dominicans concerning "efficacious grace," he would change nothing, and caused it to be set up in the place of Flora. It was as follows:

"We condemn, repulse, and reject, by virtue of our authority, the calumnies rashly advanced against the doctrines of the angelic doctor St. Thomas Aquinas, and St. Augustine and it is for the purpose of rendering a still more shining testimony to the morality taught by those fathers, and of animating still more and more the order of the Dominicans, and of all those who follow their doctrine, to make a sincere profession of it; that of our own knowledge we order the turbulent and obstinate disturbers of the repose of the Catholic church to cease their attacks against the orthodox works of St. Thomas. We enjoin on them not to turn aside the sublime meaning of those works by interpretations removed from the truth, by doing open violence as well to our own words as those of our predecessors. We prohibit them from expressing the lightest blame about our apostolical letters, and about the order of the Dominicans: and we condemn the letters, pamphlets, theses, and books which have attacked or may attack the followers of the Thomistic school."

This bull was a positive declaration of war against the Society of Jesus. Its children, however, were silent, from fear of reviving their old quarrel with the Dominicans, at a time when they already had the Quenellists upon their hands. They also feared, by raising the gauntlet which had been thrown down to them by the disciples of St. Dominic, to discontent the cardinal Coscia, who appeared to be already tired of these incessant disputes, and who was, besides, occupied with very serious difficulties which had broken out between the Holy-See and the courts of Turin and Lisbon, in regard to the confirmation of the indult which Victor Amadeus claimed, that is to say, the right of nominating to the vacant benefices in the island of Sardinia, which he had exchanged for Sicily; and in the matter of the king of Portugal, it was to obtain a hat, the hat of a cardinal, for the nuncio Bichi, an infamous prelate, for whom his majesty, John the Fifth, had taken a singular affection, and whom he wished to introduce by force into the sacred college.

The reverend fathers had foreseen that the discussions of the friends of the constitution, and the appellants of France, would absorb all the attention of Nicholas Coscia, and would not permit him to enter into fresh intrigues. Matters were indeed assuming a character of extreme gravity. At the close of the "Brigandage of Embrun," twelve opposing bishops had protested against the judgment, and with them fifty advocates of the bar of Paris, had drawn up an energetic document, tending to weaken the proceedings of the council, as departing even from the text of the ecclesiastical and civil laws.

The cardinal Fleury, exasperated by this manifestation, caused the work of the advocates to be seized, handed it over to a council of stipendiary bishops, and obtained a new condemnation. The prelates decreed that the doctors of law "had wandered out of the way on all points; blamed them for having raised themselves above the authority of the church, councils, popes, bishops, and the bull "Unigenitus," by maxims and propositions rash, false, tending to schism, destructive of all hierarchy, suspected of heresy, and even heretical; they added that these lawyers had attacked the council of Embrun to the prejudice of the royal authority, and the respect which was due to a considerable number of prelates, and to the pontiff himself.

By a decree of the council of state the consultation was suppressed, and the authors denounced to the vindictiveness of the devotees. The prelates who even wished to speak, were threatened with exile; the monastic orders who dared to make simple remarks were stricken with an interdict; the poor nuns who permitted themselves to compassionate the victims, were torn mercilessly from their holy retreats, and dispersed through other communities.

This revival of persecution, which it was announced would fall on all the appellants without exception, intimidated even the members of the high clergy. The cardinal de Noailles himself, that intrepid adversary of the Jesuits, who had to this time shown himself to be immovable, staggered in his sentiments, and offered to accept the bull "Unigenitus," on condition that his enemies would allow him to die in peace. He, however, protested against the condemnation of Soanen, bishop of Senes, and appealed to the king, as well as to a future general council from the "Brigandage of Embrun." His majesty, Louis the Fifteenth, condemned this step, and made such terrible threats against the old man, who was already on the edge of the grave, that he forced him to retract his opinions, and belie his character, by publishing a mandamus in which he declared that he accepted the bull "Unigenitus" without modification.

This submission of the cardinal de Noailles was a true triumph for the constitutionalists, and consequently it inflicted a terrible blow on the appellants; for the adhesion of the metropolitan drew after it that of the chapters and canons of the first vicarates of the archbishopric. It is true that the manifestations of joy by the Jesuits opened the eyes of the venerable prelate, and showed him that he had committed an act of irreparable weakness. He himself said, weeping, to those who surrounded him, that he had, in a moment of culpable weakness, lowered himself in the eyes of men, and rendered himself unworthy to contemplate the face of Christ. The shame and despair which sprang from his acceptance hastened his end, and led him to the tomb in less than a month.

The new archbishop of Paris, Monseigneur de Vintimille, a violent man, and entirely devoted to the Holy See, undertook to subject the clergy of the second order; and by employing in turns, threats, violence, and corruption, succeeded to his entire satisfaction. He obtained a new royal ordinance which enjoined on the faculty of theology in Paris, to make a decree providing that it had accepted the constitution freely, respectfully, and without any restriction.

This great affair over, the Jesuits began to intrigue with the cardinal Coscia to have the famous monk Hildebrand, the poisoner of popes, the triumph over kings, him who, by the name of Gregory the Seventh, had exalted the religious power, and trampled under foot the sceptres and diadems of kings, canonized. This pontiff had already been beatified by Paul the Fifth; but this was not enough in the eyes of the good fathers; they wished so great a man to be raised to the rank of a saint, and to have a right to the worship of the stolid; it was to give a rich bishopric to a bishop in partibus; for the blessed, according to the Roman doctrine, is an inert personage in heaven, not enjoying any invocation, any worship, whilst the saint possesses both prerogatives.

The decree of canonization was obtained without difficulty from Benedict, who had almost fallen into second childhood; but it was not so easy to have it received in France; the parliament refused to register the legend of Gregory the Seventh; it did more, it condemned its tenor, as infringing on the rights of the crown. The parliaments of Metz, Rennes, and Bordeaux followed this example, as did several bishops, amongst others Caylus of Auxene, and Drosmenil of Verdun.

The Jesuits, whose secret end was to force kings to bow their heads before the popes, and by ruling these latter, to command the whole world, regarded it as essential to have the legend of Gregory the Seventh accepted; and to conquer the repugnance of the magistrates, they essayed to present it in a bull, in which was decreed the canonization of Vincent de Paul, the fierce persecutor of the solitaires of Port Royal. It was, however, lost pains; the counsellors of the parliament declared that they professed a profound veneration for the sublime institution of the Sisters of Charity, but that they regarded the founder as sufficiently recompensed by his title of blessed.

An event which had been for some time foreseen, suspended the discussions about this ridiculous affair; Benedict the Thirteenth died at Rome in his ninety-first year, on the 21st of February, 1730. This Dominican proved himself during his pontificate to be simple, ignorant, and superstitious, but austere in his morals, and pure in his intentions; and the only thing with which we can reproach him is, in having allowed the infamous Coscia, and the execrable Jesuits, to have too great an ascendancy over him.

CLEMENT THE TWELFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FOURTH POPE.

[A. D. 1730.]

Election of a blind pope—He endeavours to arrest the progress of civilization—Quarrel between the parliament of Paris and the cardinal de Fleury—Appeal of the priests of Orleans—Protests of the advocates—Journey of the parliament to Versailles—Polemical Gazette, called the Ecclesiastical News—The cardinal Fleury has the abbe Pucelle, several counsellors of parliament, advocates, and even doctors of the Sorbonne, carried off—Exile of the parliament—History of the deacon Paris—Condemnation of the cardinal Coscia—Progress of philosophy in France—Bulls of Clement the Twelfth against the Free Masons—History of Masonry—The pope claims the dutchies of Parma and Placenza—State of Christianity in Asia—Canonization of Vincent de Paul—Fresh opposition of parliament to the bull of the pope—Church of Holland—Sickness of the holy father—He restores the infamous Coscia to the dignity of cardinal—His nephews pillage the treasury of the church—His death.

FIFTY-THREE cardinals entered the conclave after the funeral of Benedict the Thirteenth to give him a successor, and caballed for four whole months without being able to choose a pope; finally, battalions of bugs fell upon their eminences, and put an end to the intrigues. The members of the sacred college hastened to leave their cells, which were invaded by these disgusting insects, and gave their votes to the cardinal Lawrence Corsini, a peevish and gouty octogenarian, whom they proclaimed sovereign pontiff by the name of Clement the Twelfth.

A singular incident had almost annulled the election; the pope was affected, without its being known, with almost entire blindness, which was by the canons a cause for exclusion. When the deed of his appointment was presented to him to sign, he affixed his name across the writing; fortunately, his attendant in the conclave perceived it before giving it up, and designedly spilt the ink from his inkstand over the signature, who compelled the cardinals to remake a minute of the proceeding, and prevented them from suspecting the infirmity of the newly chosen. He was careful, in the second deed, to have his hand guided by his attendant, under the pretext that his paralysis prevented him from writing. Nine days afterwards his holiness was crowned at St. Peter's, and immediately left the Vatican to establish himself with all his court in the Quirinal palace.

Clement the Twelfth was sprung from the ancient family of the Corsini of Florence; he had come to Rome when young, and entered upon an ecclesiastical career. He had successively obtained the place of prefect of the signature of livings, the dignity of archbishop of Nicomedia, of treasurer general of the apostolic chamber, and lastly the hat of a cardinal.

As soon as he was seated on the throne of the apostle, like his predecessor, he declared himself to be an enemy of the democratic ideas which were filtering through all classes of society, announced his pretensions to omnipotence, and set himself up as a pontiff of the middle age. He commenced by applauding the furious zeal of the cardinal Fleury, and encouraged that minister to use his influence to repress the liberal inclinations of parliament. That prelate had obtained from king Louis the Fifteenth, a declaration providing that the constitution "Unigenitus" should hereafter be regarded as one of the fundamental laws of the church of France, and had caused the bull to be registered in a bed of justice. As it was usual for the parliaments to make their protests against registrations on the succeeding day, the cardinal minister, who wished to shun all appearance of opposition, thought that he could not do better than prohibit the counsellors from assembling. This injunction, which was conveyed to them in the name of his majesty, at first alarmed them; they then resumed courage, and announced that they would go on and hold their sessions, notwithstanding the prohibition of an insolent priest. The counsellors were strongly urged to this resistance by an abbe named Pucelle, a member of their body, the nephew of Marshal Catinet, and one of the most determined adversaries of the Jesuits, and the more formidable from his exercising an extraordinary influence over the minds of men. Already did this generous citizen, the precursor of the apostles of liberty, who were to render the close of the century illustrious, preach openly the emancipation of the people, and prepared the way for those energetic attacks before which the papacy and royalty were to fall. His ardent, cutting, and impassioned eloquence carried away all the magistrates, and on the very next day, from the bed of justice, they decreed the four following propositions:—

“The temporal power, established directly by God, is independent of every other, and no power can inflict the least blow on its authority.

“It does not belong to the ministers of the church to fix the bounds which God has placed between the two powers; the canons of the church do not become laws of the state, until they are clothed with authority by the sovereign.

“To the temporal power alone belongs the external power which has a right to constrain the subjects of the king.

“The ministers of the church are accountable to the king and the parliament, under his authority, for all which may hurt the laws of the state; ordinances, edicts, regulations, decrees of parliament, under the authority of the head of the government, are to be executed according to their form and tenor.”

This edict was immediately erased by a decree of the council of state; and as the vacation was approaching, hostilities remained suspended. But on their return, they commenced with more vivacity than before.—Three priests of the diocese of Orleans having been interdicted by their bishop for protesting against the bull “Unigenitus,” had referred it to parliament as an abuse of power, and the counsellors, notwithstanding the declarations of Louis the Fifteenth and the decrees of his counsel, admitted the appeal of the ecclesiastics, and ordered their reinstallation into the cures from which they had been expelled. The prelate informed against them at the officialty, and they were personally summoned. Immediately a new appeal was made by the priests, and there was another decree of parliament which ordered the proceedings to be brought before its tribunal. The bishop, in his turn, presented the order of the king, and demanded that the decree of parliament should be erased as striking a blow at the laws of the church. But all the bar, excited by the abbe Pucelle, took part in the dispute; the advocates of Paris entered the lists, and forty of the most renowned of them signed a consultation, in which the temporal and spiritual powers were openly attacked. They declared that the parliaments representing the nation, no man was permitted to oppose their decrees, not even the monarch, who, in his capacity as head of the government, should set an example of submission to the laws. It was the first time that republican ideas were so clearly promulgated in France; the king was alarmed by them; the courtiers, the members of the clergy and the nobility, the princes, the cardinal minister, cried out anarchy, and demanded the punishment of the culprits. By order of his majesty, the council passed an ordinance concerning the consultation, declaring that it contained anarchical propositions, which were injurious to the royal authority, and called down all the wrath of the king upon its authors.

The archbishop of Paris raised his voice in his turn, and lanced a mandamus against the protest of the advocates; the latter appealed at once from this condemnation to the parliament, which took hold of the affair. The minister interfered and sent a sealed letter to the assembled chambers, which prohibited them in the name of the king from deliberating about ecclesiastical matters, under penalty of banishment. The magistrates, who suspected what the royal letter contained, refused to break the seal, and it was necessary for a new envoy to be sent to give a formal command to them to take cognizance of the letter, under the penalty of incurring the wrath of the king. These threats, expressed in offensive terms by the count de Maurepas, the messenger of Louis the Fifteenth, so irritated the counsellors, that they decided, with one consent, to go at once to the king, to inform him of the brutal manner in which his agents executed his orders. They first opened the letter and saw, with indignation, that the insolent monarch had exceeded the rudeness of his favourite; their first determination was, however, maintained, and the departure for Marly was immediately effected. When they arrived at this residence, as they were not preceded by any express, they found the court in the greatest disorder, and were obliged to traverse the galleries in the midst of a hedge of lords in dishabille and titled courtizans, who spared neither taunts nor railleries on them. It was in vain that the first president negotiated to obtain an audience of the monarch; his majesty refused to receive him. This scandalous scene was only terminated by the arrival of Fleury, who had hastened from Paris on the first news of what was passing. The cardinal minister presented himself before the bantered, degraded, and humbled magistrates, and informed them that they had better retire if they did not wish to be put out by the lackeys.

The counsellors retired with rage in their hearts, and determined to take vengeance for the outrages they had drunk. On the next day on the appeal of the advocates of the bar of Paris, they condemned the mandamus of the archbishop de Vintimille, and suppressed it as containing ultra montane doctrines, which were destructive of the rights of the nation. They, moreover, secretly encouraged the circulation of a host of pamphlets and songs directed against the cardinal de Fleury, Monseigneur de Vintimille, the Jesuits, and even the king.

Among all these publications, there was one which was remarkable for the violence of its attacks and the power of its reasoning ; it was an hebdomadal sheet, which had been issued for some years by the name of the "Ecclesiastical News." A priest named Fontaine de la Roche, who was its founder and principal conductor, flagellated unmercifully the Jesuits, the bishops, and the pope ; he designated them in his articles by no other names than those of robbers and thieves ; he accused them of thinking of nothing but speculating on the folly of men, so as to make the wealth of nations flow into their coffers, and supported his accusations by historical and irrefutable proofs.

The court was treated with no more respect in the "Ecclesiastical News" than the clergy. Fontaine de la Roche tore away, without pity, the veil which concealed the idol, and exhibited the infamous Louis the Fifteenth in all his hideous nudity. Monseigneur de Vintimille seeing the still increasing success of this gazette, endeavoured to have it seized ; but the bloodhounds of the police failed in their search, and could not discover either the presses where it was printed, or the bookseller who published it ; he then fulminated an excommunication against the unknown authors, and prohibited the priests of his diocese from reading it, under penalty of interdict. Several of them refused to submit, and as the prelate threatened to bring them before the official, they denounced the mandamus to parliament. Again the cardinal Fleury interfered in the strife, and prohibited the counsellors from deliberating on the matter. They deputed a commission to the monarch to address remonstrances to him ; the envoys were badly received and their representations rejected. The parliament then announced that it was about to break off its judicial labours, and the court of requests immediately suspended its sessions.

The king, who feared lest this determination should produce serious troubles, immediately sent for the counsellors to Compiègne, where he was. They obeyed, and went in a body to the monarch ; his majesty awaited them in the throne room, in order to intimidate them by the solemnity of their reception. When they were admitted into his presence, he ordered them to resume the exercise of their functions, and renewed his injunctions not to interfere in ecclesiastical matters. The first president wished to make some observations to him ; but at the first word, Louis the Fifteenth interrupted him, and said in an imperious tone, "Be silent, for every reply will be punished as a crime against the state." The intrepid Abbe Pucelle then left the ranks of the counsellors and silently deposited a written protest at the feet of the monarch.

The crowd of titled slaves who surrounded their master, broke out into murmurs against the daring man ; the count de Maurepas seized the protest and tore it up before the eyes of the downcast magistrates. They retired without uttering a complaint, but each one was well determined to persist in his opposition and to compel the despot to repent his unworthy conduct. To heighten the trouble, the cardinal de Fleury had the abbe Pucelle carried off by his guards, and conducted to his abbey of Corbigny ; and to intimidate the refractory, he acted with the same rigour towards five counsellors, whose energy he most dreaded.

The parliament demanded the return of its members, the court affected not to pay any attention to its request ; then the people interfered in the quarrel, and meetings took place in all parts of the capitol. The old cardinal became alarmed, and hastened to open negotiations for the return of the magistrates, awarding to parliament the right of remonstrance in ecclesiastical matters. All the chambers returned to Paris, and tranquillity was for some time restored.

We must also say that another cause contributed to moderate the attacks against the Jesuits ; it was the discredit into which Jansenism had fallen among enlightened men, in consequence of the fanaticism of the ignorant of the sect. Some greedy priests who wished to speculate on the infatuation of the imbecile, got up a story, that several Jansenists, who had been dead some years, were performing miracles, and by the aid of this fraud extorted money from the devotees.—Among these holy persons was one named the deacon Paris, who had a colossal reputation. He was merely a priest, the son of a counsellor to the parliament, and one of the most determined appellants. At his death a great concourse of the poor, whom he had appointed his heirs, accompanied the funeral. After the burial, all these unfortunates, yielding to a sentiment of gratitude, had come to kiss the earth which covered his coffin. The priests of St. Medard, in which cemetery he had been interred, struck by this sentiment of profound veneration, determined to take advantage of it, reported skilfully that miracles were performed at the tomb of the deacon, and erected a magnificent marble mausoleum to him. Their trick succeeded, and an incredible number of the faithful soon flocked from all parts to the cemetery of St. Medard.

Prepossessed minds saw what they had promised themselves to see ; the imbecility of the devotees seconded the gross charlatanism of the priests, and it became very easy to speculate on credulity by healing the pretended sores which swindlers exhibited before the eyes of the fanatical. In less than a month the number of visitors had so increased, that they had to open twelve entrances to the cemetery, that the crowd might walk round freely ; it was still necessary for visitors to wait several hours before they could reach the tomb. This, moreover, did not purchase too dearly the pleasure of assisting at the singular spectacle which was given there.

In a reserved enclosure, into which visitors were only admitted for money, men and women, pell mell, and almost naked, were agitated—danced and gamboled in the midst of contortions so strange, and convulsions so lively, that it was impossible to see how these unfortunates could stand such rough exercise. Sometimes more than a hundred persons were seen at once, rolling about, entwined together, and acting in the most indecent manner. Several persons of distinction took part in these extravagances, amongst others the chevalier Folard, celebrated for his "History of Polybius," and Louis Basil de Montgeron, counsellor to the parliament, and the author of several works on the deacon Paris and the Convulsionists.

The scenes became so scandalous that the authorities were obliged to put an end to them, and to close the cemetery of St. Medard. On the next day this epigram was found fastened to the gate :

"In the king's name—God is prohibited from performing miracles in this place."

This step did not, however, put a stop to the pernicious representations of the deacon Paris; the priests continued their culpable industry in private assemblies, and recruited adepts from among all classes of society. There were counted more than eight hundred thaumaturgs or demoniacs, who gave spectacles still more licentious from the profane being excluded from their meetings. Girls and women played the principal parts in these religious saturnalia; they excelled especially in forcible whirling, and games of suppleness; some, in imitation of the eastern dervishes, turned on their toes with extraordinary rapidity, so as to give a vertigo to those who looked at them; others reversed their positions like rope dancers, with their heads backwards, and then gave themselves up to puerile sports, playing with rattles, &c. Others performed various other contortions, and scenes of licentiousness were enacted unfit to be recorded.

In proportion as the Jansenists lost ground, the Jesuits appeared to become more formidable, more imperious, more insolent than ever in the provinces of France. But this triumph was but a feeble compensation to the Society of Jesus for the checks they experienced at Rome, where their protectors, and especially the cardinal Coscia, became the object of animadversion to the citizens and even to the old pope.

The palace of the former valet of Benedict the Thirteenth had been pillaged by the Romans, and the cardinal archbishop of Benevento, to insure his personal safety, had been constrained to leave the apostolical city and retire to Naples, which did not prevent the committee appointed to examine the acts of his government from placing him under an interdict, sequestering his property, and claiming his surrender. He was taken back to Rome to be there judged by a special commission, and after a minute examination he was condemned to excommunication, to lose his vote in the conclave, to restore the money he had stolen from the treasury, to pay a fine of a hundred thousand ducats, and to be confined for ten years in the castle of San Angelo. His brother, the bishop of Targa, who had been judged guilty of malversation, was already confined in the same fortress. The cardinal Fini, one of those who had been the highest in the favour of Coscia, was also pursued for the crime of concussion; but Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, to whom he had rendered great services, having undertaken his defence, the sovereign pontiff stopped the proceedings, and even reinstated him in all his dignities.

Whilst the Jesuits and the chief of the church were struggling for the rule of the world, and were discussing the right to plunge nations into brutality from a speculative and egotistical interest, a war cry arose from the middle of France, which, repeated by a thousand voices, taught Rome and its black cohorts that God was watching over humanity. The Pleiad of philosophers, which had already ranged themselves around Voltaire, attacked the church, and inflicted on it rude blows, from which it has not since recovered. Voltaire, the leader of these lofty spirits, was then shining in all the aureole of his glory, and was battling in the breach against the civil and religious authority of popes, bishops, and priests, those implacable enemies of all advancement. Montesquieu combatted by his side in the cause of liberty, and published his famous Persian letters; Rousseau, Diderot, and d'Alembert, entered the lists and reinforced the battalion of the encyclopedists; Maupertuis, Clairault, Camus, Le Montais, &c. determined, geometrically, the figure of the earth, by measuring a degree from the meridian under the equator, and another under the poles.

All these great men impressed an irresistible impulse on their cotemporaries, and forced the third estate, the nobility, and even a great part of the French clergy, to march in their train in their progressive route to the conquest of a new order of things. The political movement, though less apparent than the religious, was not the less real. Secret associations were every where organised to labour for the overthrow of kings and priests; the sacred love of liberty, that divine sentiment, the lightnings of which despots had restrained for so many years, was reanimating all hearts. Rome was moved by this revolutionary tendency of the mind, and to arrest it Clement the Twelfth declared war on secret societies, and fulminated a terrible bull against the Freemasons, who had established lodges in England, Scotland, France, Germany, and Italy.

His holiness prohibited his subjects, under penalty of death, from becoming affiliated with, or from assisting at an assembly of Freemasons, or even from inducing any one to enter the proscribed society, or only from rendering aid, succour, counsel, or a retreat to one of its members. He also enjoined on the faithful, under penalty of the most severe corporeal punishments, to denounce those whom they suspected of being connected with them, and to reveal all they could learn touching this heretical and seditious association. These proscriptions, instead of checking the advance of freemasonry, contributed to give it extraordinary lustre, and Europe was soon covered by a prodigious number of lodges.

The initiated maintain that the institution of their order goes back to the most remote antiquity, and say, "that as soon there were sufferers, there were masons to solace them; that as soon as there were unjust men, there were masons to repair the injustice; that as soon as there were knaves and oppressors, there were masons to combat them."

Some commentators have placed the cradle of masonry in the country of the ancient Idumeans, under the reign of the third king of the Israelites, the great Solomon, and have supposed that after the construction of the famous temple of Jerusalem, the Jewish king had assembled all the workmen who had concurred in building the monument, into a society. Others place the commencement of the society in the time of the Pharaohs, at the period when Moses appeared. Some make it descend from the Templars, and others even declare that it owes its birth to the Vaudois, the Wickliffites, and the Hussites, those protestant sects which have been so violently persecuted by the Catholics.

Among these different opinions, that put forth by the skilful antiquarian, Prestora, appears to be the most truthful. According to his opinion, a Roman general, named Carranius, charged with the conquest of Great Britain, towards the year 287 of our era, had caused himself to be recognised by his legions as emperor of the British isles, had formed an independent state, and protected the arts, and especially architecture, and had instituted solemn meetings of architects and workmen, who called themselves Freemasons, and who from that time did not cease to form a society organised for the construction of the principal monuments of England.

He maintains that in 600 they constructed the cathedral of Canterbury, that of Rochester in 602, the famous church of St. Paul in 604, the church of St. Peter of Westminster in 605, and that towards the end of the ninth century, they were employed by Alfred the Great to reconstruct the castles which had been burned during the war with the Danes. Until the year 924, the society of architects and working masons continued their useful labours; it was still but an association of workmen. That year King Athlestan gave them a special protector in his brother Prince Edwin. Two years afterwards he permitted his brother to decorate himself with the title of Grand Master of the masonic brothers. The headquarters of the fraternity were established at York, which, on account of other associations of the same kind established in the different provinces of England, received the designation of the grand lodge.

From Great Britain, the society passed into Scotland about the year 1550, but it was not until two centuries afterwards, in 1717, that masonry assumed the character of a mysterious society. It owed it chiefly to its grand master, Christopher Wren, to whom succeeded Anthony Sayer and George Payne. The last of these made regulations, subjected the society to fixed rules, and re-established the ceremonial, which had become much altered. Although there remains no trace of the passage of the corporation of architects and workmen into the institution of Freemasonry, it is probable that it took place at the close of the struggle between democracy and absolutism under the Stuarts.

From the British isles masonry passed into France, and an Anglo French lodge was installed in Paris in the beginning of the year 1725. A quarter of a century had not passed by, when the institution crossed the Alps and the Pyrenees, passed the Rhine, and planted itself through all Europe.

His holiness, obliged to renounce the hope of annihilating masonry, turned all his attention to his own affairs, and thought of increasing his treasures, to be the better enabled to corrupt, if not to combat his enemies. At the instigation of his nephews, he sold to Philip the Fifth of Spain, for his son Don Louis, who was scarcely eight years old, the briefs which raised a child in his jacket to the dignity of archbishop of Toledo and Seville, and which conferred on him the title of cardinal.

This sacrilegious appointment, and this act of cowardly compliance with the wishes of the king of Spain, did not, however, produce the consequences which the court of Rome expected from them. His Catholic majesty thought himself liberated from all obligations to the holy father, by the millions he had given to his family, and made no scruple in putting in execution, notwithstanding the pope's prohibition, the plan of invasion he had long meditated, in order to place the crowns of Naples and Sicily on the head of his second son.

A war broke out between the different powers of Europe, for the succession to the throne of Poland, become vacant by the death of Frederick Augustus. The father-in-law of Louis the Fifteenth, the old Stanislaus Lecinski, claimed the throne, from which he had been driven, as a property belonging to him, and was sustained in his pretensions by France, which naturally led Savoy and Spain into his party. The elector of Saxony, who had been proclaimed king of Poland by the states, sought on his side to maintain himself, and was supported by Russia and Austria. Holland and England remained tranquil spectators of the strife.

After a war of two years, Charles the Sixth was constrained to sign the treaty of Vienna, and to cede to the infant Don Carlos, the second son of Philip the Fifth, the kingdom of Naples, Sicily, the island of Elba, and the estates degli Presidi, in exchange for the duchies of Parma and Placenza, which the court of Rome claimed as dependencies of the Holy See. Clement the Twelfth protested against the treaty of Vienna, but the parties went on, took possession of the contested territories, and made the exchanges.

His holiness, unable to sustain his pretensions by an army, submitted to force, and is console himself for this check, fell back upon ecclesiastical affairs. He sent several nuncios into the provinces of Italy, to superintend the conduct of the priests, and gave a mission to an ab-legatè, to go into Syria and convene a provincial council, to reform the abuses which had been introduced into the convents.

He did not content himself with extending his solicitude over ignorant people; he endeavoured to rekindle the zeal of European nations, by promotions in the heavenly militia. He raised to the rank of saint the blessed Jesuit, John Francis Regis, the beatified Catherine Flisco, the beautiful Julianna Falconieri, the Capuchin Joseph de Leonissa, as well as the fanatical Vincent de Paul, whose canonization had been already rejected by the French during the last pontificate. The earnestness of the court of Rome to have the founder of the order of missions catalogued among the saints, became afterwards the cause of a very great disappointment, through a singular accident, of which Grimm speaks in his correspondence with Diderot. This was the fact; in 1659, Vincent de Paul, when dying, had confided a sealed package to one of his friends, the head of the family of d'Argenson, with an injunction that it was not to be opened until a hundred years after his death. When the term had expired, M. de Paulny, the great grandson of d'Argenson, broke the seals of the deposit, in the presence of Louis the Fifteenth, and found a letter from Vincent de Paul, in which the saint declared, that he had always lived and died in the opinions of Socinianism; that in the conviction this doctrine would be universally spread before a century had gone by, he wished his profession of faith to remain unknown until the time in which falsehood should have given place to truth.

Thus was it proved, that Vincent de Paul, the fierce enemy of the Jansenists, the corypheus of the Molinist party, persecuted his enemies for the pleasure alone of glutting his vengeance, without any religious conviction, without even having the excuse of fanaticism, since he neither believed in the divinity of the Catholic religion, nor the infallibility of the popes, nor even in the existence of Jesus Christ!

And yet the bull which conferred the honours of the apotheosis was granted to him for his orthodox zeal! "It is because Vincent de Paul never ceased to exhort the king, the queen, and their ministers, to persecute such of their subjects as were opposed to the Roman communion, that we grant him his commission of saint," said Clement the Twelfth in his bull; "it is to recompense him for having massacred those who were obstinate in the Jansenist error, that we rank him among the cohorts of the heavenly militia For if it is true that the church refuses to shed blood, we must, however, say that it draws great assistance from the secular power, and that it cannot too much encourage the ministers of the altars to claim the aid of kings, to force heretics to recur to spiritual remedies, through fear of punishment."

The parliament, which did not approve of the sanguinary doctrines of the court of Rome, suppressed the bull canonizing Vincent de Paul, as tending to destroy the maxims of the Gallican church, and as surpassing the system of the partizans of papal omnipotence. The cardinal de Fleury, who had perhaps a secret hope of meriting the distinction of Vincent de Paul, took the side of the saint against the parliament, and reinstalled him in heaven by an edict of Louis the Fifteenth. The magistrates persisted in their former decision, and for the third time expelled Vincent from paradise. The quarrel warmed; the Jesuits took part in it, wrote volumes in defence of the saint, and seized on the occasion to attack the Jansenists, and even the university. The doctors of the Sorbonne replied with vigour, and raised the old discussion about the bull "Unigenitus." As always, the cardinal de Fleury interfered, gained their cause for the disciples of Ignatius, and exiled the members of the university by an ordinance of the king.

In the midst of all these disputes, ultramontanism became more and more discredited in the eyes of the nations. In Holland a church which has maintained itself to our own days, afforded at that period the singular sight of a community entirely Catholic in its doctrines, ritual and discipline, though entirely separated from the Holy See.

Codde, the apostolic vicar of that country, had been pursued by the pope, on account of his Jansenist opinions, and had been several times obliged to obtain the assistance of the states-general to maintain himself in his post, and to have the bulls of the court of Rome, which deprived him of his functions, erased. After his death, seven canons of Utrecht, also partizans of Jansenius, had persevered in the revolt against the Holy See, and had of their own authority proclaimed as archbishop, Steenhoven, to whom succeeded Burchman Wuytiers, a violent Jansenist, who set an example of every evangelical virtue, received with admirable charity all the French who were exiled for the cause of religion, and succoured them from his own purse, when the appellant party could not send them aid in money.

At every election of a new prelate to the see of Utrecht, the titular never failed to address synodical letters to the reigning pontiff, to inform him of his election. Burchman Wuytiers being dead, his successor, the prelate Meindartz, conformed to existing usages, and sent his letters to Clement the Twelfth. His holiness replied by a bull of anathemas, which did not prevent Meindartz from continuing his sacerdotal functions as before, and from re-establishing the bishopric of Harlem, which had been extinct for a hundred and fifty years.

Clement the Twelfth was so chagrined at seeing himself braved by a mere archbishop, that he became very sick. His nephews foresaw that his end was approaching; they hastened to use the time advantageously, stole all the treasures shut up in the Quirinal palace, and to assure themselves of impunity, they forced the dying pontiff to sign a bull of re-installation in favour of Coscia, by annulling the condemnation pronounced against him, in order to deprive his successor of all desire of acting against them. The infamous Nicholas Coscia left the castle of San Angelo, was reinstated in his dignity of cardinal and archbishop, and in almost all his property. Some days after having accomplished this great iniquity, the old gouty and blind pope died, on the 6th of February, 1740.

BENEDICT THE FOURTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FIFTH POPE.

[A. D. 1740.]

Election of Cardinal Lambertini—The beginning of his reign—Ambition of the pontiff—His condescension towards kings—Voltaire and Benedict the Fourteenth—The pope secretly favours the Jesuits—Struggle between them and the philosophers—The publication of the Encyclopædia—Bull of the pope against Freemasons—Decretals concerning the property of the French clergy—Louis the Fifteenth and la Pompadour are threatened with ecclesiastical thunders—The Jesuits wish to restore the inquisition in France—Origin of the billets of confession—Parliament seizes on the temporalities of the archbishop of Paris—The counsellors are exiled to Pontoise—Protests of all the parliaments of France against the persecutions exerted by the Jesuits—The edict of silence—The French priests refuse burial to the dead—Exile of the archbishop of Paris—Benedict the Fourteenth exhorts Louis the Fifteenth to protect the Jesuits, and persecute the philosophers—His majesty is constrained to revoke the law of silence—Quarrel between the court and parliament—Attempt to assassinate Louis the Fifteenth—Condemnation and punishment of Damiens—Death of Benedict the Fourteenth.

In consequence of the appointments to the cardinalate made during the last pontificate, of fifty-four members of the sacred college, who entered into conclave after the death of Clement the Twelfth, there were only four Spanish, three French, and one German cardinal; the Italian party was in a vast majority. Their eminences were divided into two coteries; that of the cardinals created by Clement the Eleventh, Innocent the Thirteenth, and Benedict the Thirteenth, who were called the old college, and that of the members of the new formation, which was called the new college. These two parties presented successively as candidates Rurro, Rezzonico, and Fiffao; one of them obtained even as many as thirty-three votes. There was wanting but one more vote to place a pontiff on the chair of the apostle, when Prosper Lambertini caused the election to fail by a pleasantry, in replying to one of his colleagues who claimed his vote, and showed that it depended on his will to make a pope, "that he would not usurp the functions of the Holy Spirit." The wary Lambertini had the more reason for not giving his vote to the candidate, since, under an appearance of indifference, he was himself intriguing for the papacy. The election having failed, the intrigues recommenced and prolonged the conclave until the month of August; then came the interference of the bugs, as in the last conclave, to bring their eminences to agreement.

Prosper Lambertini, thinking that his colleagues were tired of debating, made them a pleasant speech, and finished as follows:—"To terminate the matter, if you want a holy pontiff, take Gotti; if you desire a skilful politician take Aldovrandi; but, if you prefer a good fellow take me." They laughed at the sortie, went to balloting, and thirty-four cardinals, who thought they were merely continuing a joke, gave him their votes. On counting the votes, they found, to their great astonishment, that they had made him a pope; but there was no time to look back upon an accomplished act, and on the 17th of August, 1740, Prosper Lambertini was proclaimed pontiff, by the name of Benedict the Fourteenth.

The new vicar of Jesus Christ was in his sixty-seventh year. He was born of an illustrious family in Bologna. It is said that, from his youth, he had fixed his ambitious hopes upon the apostolic throne, and that during his whole life he had not wandered for a single instant from the route he had traced out to reach it. Endowed with an active and acute mind, an extraordinary penetration, and an observant genius, he had discovered that to reach the high fortune to which he aspired, he must bridle his turbulent passions, and plunge into the depths of canonical jurisprudence, and the imaginary spaces of theological subtleties. His first labours had procured for him the services of the celebrated advocate Justinian, who took him in the capacity of a clerk; Lambertini himself afterwards obtained the title of consistorial advocate, and that of promoter of the faith. He triumphed over the disgusts which theological studies inspired in his mind, and composed sixteen folio volumes about ecclesiastical matters. All that this alarming delivery of grievous labour must have cost to the mind of Lambertini, proves how ardent was his thirst for greatness. An affectionate tone of voice, prepossessing manners, and an appearance of frankness, which no one could resist, soon made him numerous partizans. He united himself with all men who, like himself, had a passion for the sciences, for historical inquiries, and for the arts. He professed the highest esteem for Father Montfancon, a learned Benedictine, whom he knew at Rome, and who said of him, "that he had two souls, one for ecclesiastical science, and another for worldly knowledge." In fact, the theological studies of the young advocate of the consistorial court, did not prevent him from cultivating the good Italian authors, and adorning his memory with their most brilliant passages. "They growl at me," said he, "that I have had light intercourse with Tasso, Dante, and Ariosto; but do they not know that the reading of these is the delicious beverage which aids me in digesting the heavier substance of the stupid doctors of the church? Do they not know that these poets furnish me with the brilliant colours, by the assistance of which I am enabled to reconcile the incongruities of religion."

The gaiety of the young Lambertini, and his prodigious knowledge caused him to be distinguished at the court of Clement the Eleventh. His holiness made him a canon of St. Peter, then bishop, then counsellor to the holy office, associate of the congregation on the rituals, and canonist of the penitentiary. Innocent the Thirteenth elevated him to the dignity of archbishop of Theodosia in partibus; Benedict the Thirteenth made him titular prelate of Ancona, and introduced him into the sacred college; and finally, Clement the Twelfth, in 1732, had promoted him to the archbishopric of Bologna, his natal city, where he made himself numerous partizans. We must render him this justice, that he governed his diocese paternally, protected the weak, and was, in all things, of an amiable tolerance.

Having become the head of the church, Lambertini changed in nothing his affectionate manners; he preserved his cheerful faculties, his piquant mind, and did not depart from his habit of tolerance in religious matters. He was, however, pope, and as such was obliged to rule the nations. From the summit of the Vatican, his genius hovered over all the kingdoms of Christendom, to discover what it was useful to maintain, or what proper to abandon for the interests of Rome. He remarked the great change that had taken place, not only in Italy and southern Europe, but even in the general condition of political affairs in the north. He discovered that among the powers which governed the destinies of the Christian world Russia, Prussia, and England had raised themselves to the first rank, and preserved a marked superiority over the Catholic kingdoms; he observed that the practical good sense, mechanical, manufacturing, and commercial genius of England had conquered the monkish nonchalance of Spain and the political Jesuitism of France; that the energetic organization of Prussia had triumphed over the ultra montane monarchy of Austria, and that the sword of Russia threatened to annihilate the fanatical aristocracy of Poland.

Benedict satisfied himself that this preponderance, though entirely material, would exercise a reaction on religious affairs; that Russia would not fail to establish Greek archbishops in the United Provinces of Poland; that Prussia would not be backward in preaching revolt among the German Lutherans; that England, extending its rule over the seas, would arrest the progress of the Catholic missions. He discovered what enormous faults his predecessors had committed in their attempts at religious reactions; he perceived that the persecutions committed by the execrable Jesuits had only succeeded in arresting for a moment the intellectual movement of the masses; he saw that in France the massacres commanded by Louis the Fourteenth, and the ridiculous quarrels excited by Cardinal Fleury, the minister of Louis the Fifteenth, had heaped up so much hatred, that it was to be feared, lest their explosion should overthrow both the altar and the throne; he calculated the results which a literature, hostile to despotic power, was to produce, by attracting to itself all minds, and enchainning them by the indissoluble bonds of truth. Though the different tendencies of the great men of this period accorded but little among themselves, he observed that all tended to the same centre of activity, the same end, the destruction of royalty and the papacy. In fact, notwithstanding the difference in their ideas and sentiments, the partizans of religious reform who were combatting the omnipotence of Rome, and the leaders of the philosophical party who placed themselves in formal opposition to the monarchy, combined their double movement, and impressed an extraordinary force on this single and multiple tendency.

His holiness, by studying these different symptoms, discovered that mankind was accomplishing a great work; that the people, tired of bending their heads, were preparing to claim their slighted rights, and that the time was not far distant in which kings and priests would have to account with the nations.

In this foresight, Benedict determined to save the vessel of St. Peter, by following an entirely different route from that of his predecessors, and by labouring to render religion venerable by reforming the abuses which existed among the clergy. He at first thought of submitting the Jesuits to ecclesiastical discipline and of restraining their privileges. He resumed the matter of the Chinese worship, and issued the bull "Ex quo Singulari," in which he reviewed all the phases of this long proceeding since the first decisions of the society of the propaganda. He annulled the concessions wrenched from the legate Mezza-barba, and prescribed the form of an oath to be taken by missionaries, in order that the good fathers should not again take a fancy to free themselves from the obedience which they owed to the Holy See. He acted with the same rigour towards ecclesiastics, and undertook to reduce all the priests of Christendom beneath his authority, from the simple deacon to the proud bishop.

We must say that this despotism was in opposition to the doctrine of the apostles, and particularly to that of St. Paul, who recognised the right of absolute jurisdiction by prelates in their dioceses. Benedict, however, went on and, in opposition to this doctrine, prohibited them from performing their ministerial acts, without having referred them to him, and to sustain these encroachments, he composed a book called, "The Diocesan Synod," in which he exalted the papacy, and abased the episcopate. This conduct towards inoffensive prelates demonstrates that if circumstances had favoured him, he would have treated people and kings as he did the bishops. But he dared not expose the pontifical barque to perish in the bosom of the revolutionary tempest, which appeared to him to be so imminent, nor did he wish it to be dismasted by the sovereigns who appeared to be desirous to tow it.

Instead of being despotic towards the people, he affected to be opposed to the bull "Unigenitus." To gain the favour of the potentates, he appeared to place himself without the continental diplomatic circle, and flattered the pretensions of all the sovereigns. He was careful to observe a modest neutrality in the war of the Austrian succession, which broke out on the death of Charles the Sixth, and in which the different powers of Europe took a more or less active part. A pontiff less enlightened would have interfered in this bloody strife, and the thunders of the Vatican would have fallen on the head of the candidate rejected by the Holy See. Benedict the Fourteenth, a skilful politician, was content to be a spectator, without taking part either for Duke Charles Albert of Bavaria, whom the electors had proclaimed emperor by the name of Charles the Seventh, or for the young Maria Theresa, the daughter of the deceased monarch, who had been appointed by her father the heiress of his dominions. The pope acted like Moses on Mount Horeb, he raised his arms to heaven, whilst the armies were exterminating themselves in the Austrian provinces. He gave a free passage, without distinction, to the troops of Maria Theresa, the Spaniards, and the Neapolitans, and even permitted them to establish themselves on the territories of the states of the church. It is true, that after the war, his holiness did not forget to have large indemnities allowed him by the belligerent parties for their sojourn in his dominions.

Peace restored, he sought to obtain the good will of Maria Theresa; and to establish concord between the courts of Rome and Vienna, he suppressed the patriarchate of Aquila, which was asked by the empress queen, notwithstanding the active opposition of the Venetians, and permitted her, as she desired, to tolerate the protestant worship in her dominions. "It is a great good," he wrote on this subject, to seek to bring back the Lutherans to the Catholic religion, not by employing the sword, as some of our predecessors practised, but by persuasion and mildness."

In his solicitude for conciliatory measures, Benedict sought the friendship of the Italian princes, and even purchased it by important concessions, against the opinion of the members of the sacred college. He thus consented to the ratification of the concordat, agreed upon during the pontificate of Benedict the Thirteenth, with Victor Emanuel, king of Sardinia, which Clement the Twelfth had annulled as contrary to the ecclesiastical immunities, and which conceded to the government of that prince, the right of not being restrained in his fiscal operations by a foreign ecclesiastical power, of submitting priests to the secular jurisdiction, of appointing to all the vacant bishoprics, and of prohibiting the publication of the decrees of the court of Rome, without their first receiving the sanction of the sovereign. His holiness also granted to Don Carlos, the new king of the two Sicilies, several privileges which he demanded, amongst others the abrogation of a great number of festivals which cramped commerce; this abrogation was afterwards extended to all the Catholic states. From gratitude Don Carlos, the son of Philip of Spain, the founder of the Bourbon race of Naples, which still reigns, unfortunately for the people, came in person to render homage to Benedict for his dominions and to kiss his sandals.

The pope also showed a very great deference for Frederick the Second, king of Prussia, that royal witling, who published the ante-Machiavel, at the very time he was putting in practice the despotical maxims of that book; he authorised him to fill the bishoprics of Silesia, a Catholic country which he had conquered from Austria, and when his Prussian majesty, not wishing to have too skilful priests in his dominions, presented as a successor to Cardinal Zinzendorf in the see of Breslau, a subject who was almost an idiot, Benedict shut his eyes upon it, and ratified the nomination of the imbecile prelate. This act of compliance procured for the head of the church a large sum of money and rich presents, which were offered him by the margravine of Bareith, the sister of the king, who made a journey to Rome expressly for this purpose.

These tolerant and conciliatory tactics succeeded marvellously well, and procured for the sovereign pontiff the friendship of all the princes of Europe. Elizabeth, empress of Russia, styled him the sage; the king of Portugal wrote to him on a footing of the most intimate friendship; the sultan Mahmoud sent ambassadors to compliment him. It was a curious thing to hear a pope say to a cardinal, "This good Turk has said the most amiable things in the world to me, through the marquis de Maio." But of all the homages which his policy procured for him, that which flattered him most was unquestionably that of Voltaire.

This great writer had had his tragedy of Fanaticism refused by the censor; it appeared to him pleasant to procure the assistance of the pope for his piece, and to dedicate it to the successor of Boniface the Eighth, John the Twenty-second, and Pius the Fifth. Lambertini finding it to be piquant, and useful to sustain the tottering papacy, on the arm which had inflicted such terrible blows upon it, accepted the dedication. The philosopher then entered upon an exchange of courtesies with the head of the church, in order to enrage the faction of devotees which persecuted him; the holy father replied to his letters, in order to make an ally of a writer, who was regarded as the luminary of the age. They cajoled each other with all their might; Voltaire seasoned his eulogies with all the salt of his mind: Benedict placed in his all the unctious address of the vicar of God. But in this kind of fencing the priest had the advantage over the philosopher. In return for his gift of the manuscript of the tragedy of Mohamet, his holiness replied by sending an admirable medal struck with his likeness. Arouet de Voltaire, the philosophical writer, the antagonist of the Roman church, was seduced by his vanity, and thundered forth an eulogy on the virtues and talents of the politic Lambertini, in odes which were repeated from pole to pole. As an act of reciprocity, the pontiff took the tragedy of Fanaticism under his protection, raised the interdict of censure, and obtained permission for it to be played at Paris. All Europe applauded the philosophy of a pope who appeared to establish a distinction between fanaticism and religion.

Did Benedict the Fourteenth really merit the respect and veneration with which his contemporaries surrounded him? No one should dare to affirm it. History should not stop at the surface of things; before rendering a judgment, its investigating looks should penetrate into the profoundest depths of the soul of him on whom it is called to pronounce. Then it would discover that beneath the mask of tolerance with which Lambertini covered himself, the priest could not always be discovered. There was seen at the court of Rome, the commissaries of protestant sovereigns, pressing with enthusiasm around a pontiff, who maintained in force the decrees and anathemas launched by his predecessors against the dissenting communities. The English, especially, flowed into Italy, to admire with what exquisite urbanity the pope excommunicated them, and with what a charming grace he damned them; and these islanders, captivated by his address, were not sparing of eulogies upon his love for the fine arts, and the amenity of his manners.

It is not extraordinary that this concert of praise influenced the judgment of cotemporary authors, who have written about Benedict the Fourteenth. Almost all affirm, and very seriously, that the pope wished to conciliate that which is not reconcilable; to place in harmony Catholicism and philosophy; love for science and the doctrines which beatify ignorance; philanthropy and the cruel inquisition; but an evident proof that the sovereign pontiff was only submitting to the law of necessity, and that there was no good faith in his conduct, is the effort which he made at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to maintain the pretensions of the Holy See to the duchies of Parma and Placenza, as well as to the island of Corsica.

As the political interests of the powers could not accommodate themselves to the claims of the court of Rome, the ambassadors of the pope were put off, and his holiness was constrained to conceal the grief which this check caused him. Benedict the Fourteenth was, besides, powerfully engaged to submission by events which tended to nothing less than the overthrow of Christianity; all minds were in a ferment in Europe, and particularly in France, where the struggle between the parliament and the clergy continued more violently than ever.

The holy father, in this emergency, thought he could not do better than connect himself with the society of the Jesuits, and use them as a bulwark to arrest the encroachments of the sovereigns, without, however, avowing himself to be the protector of an order which was held in execration every where, and whose digressions he himself had blamed. The disciples of Ignatius, satisfied with this concealed patronage, re-entered the lists and became so animated in their attacks against the parliament, that it was feared, for a short time, lest France should be divided into two parties, and afford the afflicting sight of a new religious war. At this time occurred a new rally among the philosophers of the school of Voltaire; and by the corruptions of the papacy religion suffered violence. The great text books of French infidelity received countenance in their attacks upon all revealed religion, from the evident justice of their charges against those who impiously professed to hold the keys of heaven. The policy of the Jesuits in the persecution of these men but aided the progress of their labours, for it made them popular, and gave them authority as martyrs.

Among the principles which the philosophers sought to establish, was one whose adoption became daily more imperious, on account of the wretched state of the finances; it was equal taxation among all citizens. Louis the Fifteenth, who hoped, by extending this measure to the members of the clergy, to bring enormous sums into his coffers, had the air of yielding to public opinion, and instructed the comptroller general Machant, to make arrangements to have all the privileged orders concur in the payment of taxes. The priests exclaimed scandal, sacrilege, and refused to restore the slightest part of the wealth they had extorted from the credulity of the people. To bring them to reason, a decree of the council prohibited any new establishment of chapters, colleges, or convents, without the express permission of the king, and prohibited to convents the right of acquiring, possessing, or receiving funds, houses, or rents, without the permission of the governors of the provinces. The bishops assembled for the purpose of arresting the effects of a law which was to restore the virtues of the primitive church, protested against the royal decree, and addressed remonstrances to his majesty.

The king replied to the prelates by issuing an edict, which levied an impost of several millions on the property of the church, and which enjoined on the beneficiaries to render, as soon as possible, an account of their revenues. Before the imminence of the danger all the priests rallied around the Society of Jesus; they threatened to excite the fanaticism of the ignorant populace against Louis the Fifteenth and the favourite, and intimidated the court.

Christopher de Beaumont, the archbishop of Paris, one of the principal members of the company of the Jesuits, a haughty, obstinate, and implacable ecclesiastic, resolved to attach a religious persecution to his name, and in concert with the reverend disciples of Ignatius Loyola, formed a plan of establishing tribunals of the inquisition in France, on the same model as those of Spain. The good fathers were too skilful to proceed brutally, by exacting sudden conversions through fear of punishment, as was practised in the Spanish peninsula, under the successor of the odious Philip the Fifth. They thought of making an essay with their new code on the pretended Jansenist heretics, and submitted their plan of attack to Benedict the Fourteenth, who gave it his entire approval. The bishops, heads of orders, as well as most of the curates, feigned to believe that the Jansenists were on the eve of reappearing more terrible than ever, and claimed from the secular authority the means of crushing them. On the refusal of the government to enter upon vigorous measures, Christopher de Beaumont wished to perform justice, he discharged the superior of the general hospital of Paris, under the pretext of opposition to the bull "Unigenitus," and replaced her by a nun who passed for his mistress. The parliament accused the prelate of usurpation of the attributes of the administrative council of the city of Paris, and wished to replace the superior in her dignity. The Jesuits, in their turn, accused the magistrates of sustaining heresy, and signalled them out to the vindictiveness of the devotees. The king interfered in the quarrel but gently; he would not take either side, and allowed things to become more embittered. Christopher de Beaumont, satisfied with the result of his first effort, determined to strike a second blow, which should crush all the incredulous at once. He ordered all the curates of the capital to refuse the sacraments, and even burial in the holy ground, to those who could not produce a billet of confession from an orthodox priest.

The curate of St. Stephen of the Mount, an old renegade from Jansenism, Father Bouettin, was one of the fiercest satellites of the archbishop of Paris. One of the first victims of this fanatic was the celebrated professor Coffin, the rector of the university, who had illustrated his passage through this high dignity by the establishment of gratuitous instruction. This octogenarian, the old friend and disciple of the good Jansenist Rollin, having asked for the aid of the church on his death-bed, yielded to the entreaties of his relatives, and permitted Father Bouettin to be brought to him. The latter, instead of discharging the duties of his ministry, declared to the dying man that he would not administer the sacraments to him, until he had retracted his alleged errors; Coffin, indignant at the infamy of the priest, drove him from his house, and prohibited any other ecclesiastic from being sent for. When he died Bouettin refused to bury him. A nephew of the rector, who was a counsellor to the chatelet, succeeded, with the assistance of the parliament, in having the body of his uncle received in the church, notwithstanding the prohibition of the curate. He paid dear for his triumph; eight days afterwards he was attacked with a terrible sickness to which the Jesuits were no strangers. The curate of St. Stephen of the Mount, charmed at having his vengeance to his hand, went to his enemy without being sent for, and informed him that he should not be interred in holy ground. This odious scene hastened the end of the sick man. On the next day the parliament, being advised of this act of cruelty, laid an information against Father Bouettin, and ordered him to be seized. The curate protested against the violence which was used towards him, maintained that the inviolability of the altar was attacked in his person, and alleged in his exculpation the orders of his superiors. The archbishop of Paris interfered; the magistrates, none the less, persisted in condemning the curate of St. Stephen; but, as the marchioness de Pompadour was then under the impression of fear of the clergy, the council of state erased the decree, and appeared to legitimatise the persecutions ordered by Christopher de Beaumont.

In the intoxication of the success of their policy, the Jesuits determined to follow up the struggle which had been commenced with new vigour. The duke Louis of Orleans, the son of the regent, was dying in the Jansenist monastery of St. Geneviève, whither he had caused himself to be carried; Father Bouettin, who was once a member of that community, took a kind of pride in coming to dispute for the soul of a prince of the blood with his old brethren; he was introduced into the presence of the dying man and spoke to him as he had done to the rector of the university; the devout Louis endured his sermon with patience, had the sacraments administered to him by his almoner, and expired prohibiting them from pursuing the curate of St. Peter.

This new act of audacity remaining unpunished, Bouettin continued to excommunicate the dying prince, to the great scandal of the faithful; at last the violent sacrilege which he exercised towards the old almoner of the gallant abbess of Chelles, forced the parliament to interfere. All the chambers assembled to judge the curate: a first resolve decreed his arrest; a second declared that the bull "Unigenitus" was not an article of faith, and prohibited ecclesiastics from persecuting the faithful denying it, under the penalty of being themselves incarcerated as disturbers of the public peace. A very large number of copies of this last resolve were printed and distributed; all the Parisians, Jansenists, philosophers, peaceful Christians, nobles, burghers, artisans, bought them, saying, "This is my billet of confession."

Madame de Pompadour, whom a caprice had led into the party of the philosophers, and who, from another caprice, had returned into the party of the Jesuits, had caused the decision of parliament to be erased by the council of state, which caused a frightful disorder. The preachers thundered from the height of their pretended chair of truth against the magistrates; the incredulous published stinging pamphlets against the Jesuits, who, in revenge, attacked their enemies in the very churches.

The ecclesiastics of the provinces did not remain behind those of the capital; in all parts of the kingdom the altar was profaned by a refusal of the sacraments, expressed with a brutality and the bursts of passion which are the habits of Catholic ministers. Every where the dying were left without confession, the dead without burial; no retreat was beyond the reach of the fury of the priests; private houses, monasteries, even hospitals were invaded by those wretches, and became the theatre of their odious struggles. The triumphant Jesuits began to rally, to make songs, and to sport with their adversaries. Father Bougeand had his comedy of "The Female Doctor in Theology" performed; Father Danton published one under the title of "The Bankruptcy of the Trader of Miracles." The philosophers replied with vigour, and the people repeated couplets after them, in which the eucharist was called the wafer, and in which the mummeries of religion were turned into ridicule. All this formed a singular mixture of incredulity, fanaticism, fury, and gayety. Both parties strove with the blows of the parliament and the clergy.

At last the magistrates, tired of lancing useless decrees against the priests, determined to act with vigour against their obstinate instigator, the archbishop of Paris. On the refusal of the curate to administer the sacraments to a nun of the convent of St. Agatha, called Sister Perpetua, the parliament summoned the fanatical priest to its bar; the latter sent his vicar to represent him and to declare to the counsellors that he acted by virtue of the express orders of Monseigneur Christopher de Beaumont. A deputation was immediately sent to the archi-episcopal palace, to enjoin on the prelate to administer the ordinances to the sick woman; his eminence boldly replied, that he rendered an account to no one but the pope, of the power which had been confided to him; that he, however, owed it as a duty to explain the motives of his conduct to the king, but that he would not abase himself by replying to the representatives of the people. The magistrates retired exasperated, and returned to their colleagues, who, still in session, awaited the result of their mission; parliament brought an action against the archbishop, convened the peers to judge him, and ordered his revenue to be seized. The marchioness of Pompadour caused the decree to be arrested by the council of state, prohibited the convocation of the peers, and sent the ordinance which prescribed those orders to the parliament.

The assembled chambers refused to take cognizance of the message of the favourite, pretending that it had not even the royal seal, and insisted that the peers should be convoked. Louis the Fifteenth prohibited these latter from meeting the parliament, threatened the counsellors with letters de cachet, and ordered the count d'Argenson to have the nun, who was the innocent cause of this conflict, removed from her convent, which the minister did. It is rare that the minister of a king refuses to accomplish an act of infamy.

The people cried out sacrilege; the orators of the parliament lashed, in energetic terms, the inhumanity of power, which tore a dying woman from her convent to plunge her in a dungeon. The abbe Chauvelin, one of the most distinguished members of this company, dared to discuss the illegality of letters de cachet, and by means of his eloquence, led all the counsellors, young and old, to draw up, during the sitting, a vehement protest against the arbitrary acts of the court. Louis the Fifteenth refused to receive the commissaries charged to carry it to him, and dismissed them very cavalierly. The magistrates replied that all the chambers would remain in session until their voice should reach the foot of the throne.

His majesty immediately expedited letters de cachet against the counsellors of the courts of inquiry and request. The abbe Chauvelin was sent to Mount St. Michel; Bisé-de-Lis to Pierre-en-cise; the president de Beligny to the castle of Ham; and the president de Méri to the island of St. Marguerite. The others were merely scattered through the cities which were to be their places of exile. The great chamber had alone been spared, because the court had need of it to enrol the money edicts. The king even wished to extend its attributes, but the members who composed it, and who were principally old men, were unwilling to dishonour their white locks, and refused to register the edict which made them the heirs of the spoils of their colleagues. To punish them Louis the Fifteenth exiled them to Pontoise. There these noble magistrates continued to sit as at Paris, and proceeded against the archbishop of Paris and the fanatical curates.

His majesty declared the chamber dissolved, and, to replace it, instituted a new tribunal, composed of the counsellors of state, and masters of the requests, without, however, daring to invest them with the important attribute of registering the edicts. The sovereign addressed himself to the chatelet to have his ordinances approved. This inferior tribunal was unwilling to arrogate to itself the attribute of a superior court, and refused to register the edict. The members of the new royal chamber were then obliged to open their sessions, and to sit in the hall of the Augustines without having been recognised by any body. Not only were their audiences deserted, but they were personally exposed to the insults and contempt of the advocates, who persisted in not recognising them in the capacity of judges.

The parliaments of the provinces imitated the example of that of the capital; the magistrates of Rouen stood courageously, for six months, against the orders of Louis. Those of Aix made regulations against the ecclesiastics, and paid no attention to the prohibitions of the prince; finally, the parliament of Toulouse signalised itself by energetic decrees.

On their side, the Jesuits persevered in the path they had opened. They no longer confined themselves to demanding billets of confession from the faithful who wished to commune or marry, they denounced as heretics all who refused to appear before the tribunal of penance, and occasioned such scandals that Louis the Fifteenth and Pompadour, fearing lest a curate might demand from them even, a billet of confession, decided to recall the exiled magistrates to counterbalance the encroachments of the clergy. The birth of the second son of the dauphin, the duke de Berry, who was afterwards Louis the Sixteenth, furnished the pretext for an arrangement between the court and the magistracy; and the comptroller general, Marchault, was commissioned to negotiate the return of the counsellors, with the president de Maupeou. As, however, Louis the Fifteenth and the favourite dreaded the clamours of the priests, they endeavoured to sow dissension between the members of the clergy and the Jesuits, and through the interference of the cardinal de Rochefoucauld, they managed that the bishops would no longer insist on billets of confession, provided the court would renounce its plan of levying imposts on the property of the church. After this patching up the parliament returned to Paris amid the acclamations of an immense crowd, who had gone to meet them to celebrate their return. On the next day they resumed their sessions, and signalised their reinstallation by enrolling an edict which prescribed absolute silence on religious matters. The archbishop of Paris was cast down by it, as well as the Jesuits; and the society, finding themselves no longer sustained by the court, sent deputies to Benedict the Fourteenth to claim his official interference in their quarrel with the French magistrates. The sovereign pontiff was too skilful a politician to allow his participation in what was going on in France to be suspected. He received the commissaries of the society at a public audience, before the ambassadors of the foreign courts, and replied to their harangue by an extremely adroit speech. He told them that the events which they recounted to him appeared to be inexplicable; that the priests and the magistrates appeared to him to be equally culpable; and that he was astonished that a king did not know how to control his subjects; and that he admired the solidity of a government which had resisted such shocks. Still, under the apparent calm of the holy father, it was easy to see the disappointment which the check suffered by the church in France, in its struggle with the parliament, caused him.

Venice also gave grievous causes of uneasiness to the pope by its efforts at rebellion against the Holy See. England, which had at first affected extreme veneration for Benedict the Fourteenth, commenced to show him less regard by persecuting the Scotch Catholics. In all the provinces of that kingdom the preachers thundered from their pulpits against the ultra montane priests, the Jesuits, and, consequently, the pope, who was strongly suspected of having aided the pretender, Charles Edward, the son of the chevalier St. George, and grandson of James the Second, in his adventurous expedition to the shores of Great Britain.

Benedict the Fourteenth, who was careful, in difficult matters, never to give written instructions to his agents, in order to be able to disavow them in case of failure, did not interpose his authority to save the unfortunate priests who had been arrested as partizans of the Stuarts, and cowardly abandoned them to the justice of George the Second. This act of perfidy disarmed his Britannic majesty, and procured his great esteem for the holy father. Benedict hastened to profit by it for the advantage of his see, and asked for authority to submit the regular and secular clergy which composed the orthodox churches of Great Britain to a special organization. He made several briefs to submit the monks and the Jesuits to the authority of the bishops, and published his bulls in the four Catholic districts of England, which had not been done since the time of Charles the First.

Notwithstanding the brilliant success gained by the skilful pontiff over the Anglican church, Catholicism could not be consolidated in the British kingdom, in consequence of the opposition of the Jesuits to his decrees. They could not pardon the holy father for having abandoned their brethren in Scotland, and having repaid their devotion to the Holy See with the blackest ingratitude, and they set to work to counteract his designs. It was not in England only, that the animadversion of the society for the pope manifested itself; in France even, they openly braved the admonitions of his holiness, and continued to refuse the sacraments to Jansenists, philosophers, and skeptics. The archbishop of Paris, the haughty Christopher de Beaumont, made common cause with these good fathers, and published mandamuses, enjoining on the priests of his diocese not to administer the communion to the faithful, unless they were fortified by billets of confession. The parliament proceeded against the prevaricators, and ordered its officers to apprehend the priests, to make them carry the viaticum to the dying, so that the communion was almost always preceded by a summons, and terminated by a verbal process. At length the king became enraged at the conduct of the archbishop, and ordered him to administer the sacraments; the prelate replied, that it was his duty to obey God, and not kings and their favourites. This insolence procured for him an order of exile. He continued, however, from his retreat to excite trouble in the capital, in concert with the bishop of Mirepoix, a bitter Jesuit, who disposed of the livings in the king's gift. But this prelate dying, it became very easy to bring the clergy to reason, by confiding the list of benefices to the cardinal la Rochefoucauld, and by causing him to distribute abbeyes and prebends to the ecclesiastics who exhibited devotion to the court.

In vain did the Jesuits seek to cast ridicule on those who accepted these benefices, by calling them Feuillants; their party lost its importance. They, however, succeeded by force of intrigues in deciding several bishops to assemble in a national council, to address a memoir to the monarch on the danger which royalty incurred in taking the part of the philosophers against the disciples of Ignatius Loyola. The following was the tenor of this remarkable piece:—"Sire, an imperious duty leads us to the foot of the throne, to warn you that the thick smoke which is spoken of in the holy books, which rises from the depths of the abyss, and obscures the air and the sun, appears to have spread itself over the surface of your kingdom. Know that royalty cannot subsist with the liberty which the French arrogate of speaking and writing; know that it is the interest of kings to maintain darkness, to prevent bold minds from reasoning about the origin of religions and governments; do not forget that the throne and the altar are intimately united, and that kings cannot reasonably maintain their rule without the aid of priests, and that it would be a great imprudence to take the part of the people against them. Be fearful lest men, enlightened by the philosophers, accustom themselves to regard the powers which govern them as usurpations; for from that day the monarchy will be lost. They elevate themselves from proud heights against God; philosophers first overthrow the altars of Christ, and then beat down the throne of Cæsar. Foresee these frightful evils; imprison the dangerous writers, gag the printers who lend the aid of their presses to the propagation of these pernicious doctrines, which filter through all the pores of society, and which will end in corrupting the nation. Exterminate, sire, the infamous apostles of liberty, force them to silence by the most frightful tortures and the most terrible punishments; and let their viprous breath not vibrate longer, but beneath the dark and impenetrable vaults of the dungeons of the bas-tille."

The assembly of the clergy terminated its address by representations concerning the edict which enjoined silence in religious matters, concerning the decrees which the parliament had passed against the bull "Unigenitus," and concerning the banishment of several Jesuits. His majesty making only evasive replies, the prelates determined to write solemnly to the pope, that he should at least give his opinion. Benedict, compelled to explain himself, was obliged to depart from his habitual prudence; he pronounced against the philosophers, and published the brief "Ex Omnibus," by which he declared the constitution "Unigenitus" to be an article of the faith: "No Christian," said he, "can free himself from the submission which is due to this bull, nor be opposed to it, without periling his eternal safety. The archbishop of Paris, and all the prelates who have acted with them, have done well in refusing the viaticum to the refractory, by the general rule which prohibits us from admitting a public and notorious sinner to the holy eucharist."

The brief of the holy father arrived in France at a time when the people, reduced to a frightful state of misery, were absolutely unable to meet the fiscal demands, when the parliament showed itself more refractory than ever, in the adoption of new imposts, and in which, however, Louis the Fifteenth had an urgent need for money for his mistresses and courtiers. His majesty had but one resource; it was to address himself to the clergy; he made a bargain with them, and in exchange for subsidies, revoked the edict of silence in favour of the priests, and declared in a bed of justice, that the French bishops might openly profess, in future, whatever they thought advantageous for the interests of religion.

The Sorbonne, which at this time showed itself as favourable to the bull "Unigenitus," as it had been before opposed to it, applauded the royal decree; but it was not the same with the parliament. On the refusal of the counsellors to register it, Louis the Fifteenth changed entirely the organization of the magistracy, deprived it of all political influence, suppressed the third and fourth chamber of inquests, and preserved but the great chamber. Ten counsellors, whose names have remained attached with infamy, as well as the presidents à mortier, alone consented to obey the monarch; all the others sent in their resignations, and the course of justice was again suspended.

Every thing foreshadowed a terrible struggle between the philosophers and the Jesuits, when an incident, to which an enormous importance was attached at that period, an attempt against the person of the king, distracted the public attention. On the 5th of January, at six o'clock in the evening, Louis the Fifteenth was preparing to get into his carriage to go from Versailles to Trianon; the guards were ranged under the vestibule, when suddenly a young man passing through the soldiers, came right up to the king, struck him on the breast, and immediately re-entered the crowd. His majesty feeling himself wounded, carried his hand to the place where he had been struck and exclaimed, "I am assassinated." Then perceiving a man wearing a large hat, he designated him with his hand, and ordered him to be arrested. It was in truth the assassin, who, a stranger to the customs of the court, had unluckily kept his hat on his head.

The king was carried to his bed, although the wound was extremely slight, having been made with a penknife. The queen, alarmed, hastened to the monarch; the marchioness de Pompadour found herself for a time deserted by the courtiers; the keeper of the seals, whom she had most protected, Machault, came himself to give her the order to leave Versailles; d'Argenson, who owed to her his position, his fortune, in fine, all that he was, also treated her with great contempt. Such is the usage of courts.

The assassin of the king was named Robert Francis Damiens; he was born at Tieullus, in the diocese of Arras; his father was a porter to the provostship of Arc, near St. Omer. He was put as usual to the torture, ordinary and extraordinary, to constrain him to make avowals as to the causes which had induced him to commit the crime, and as to the names of his accomplices; but it was useless; he would designate no one, and contented himself with saying, "That he stabbed the monarch to give him a warning, and to lead him back to God." It appeared from the examinations, that he had served several years with the Jesuits, and that on different occasions, he had given proofs of unbounded devotion to the society; the court was, therefore, unanimous in laying the crime of Damiens at the door of the disciples of Loyola. It was maintained that their purpose was to open the road to the throne to the dauphin, who was the protector of the company, and to cast all the odium of the assassination on the philosophers, Jansenists, and members of parliament. In fact, Damiens, in his concealments, allowed suspicions to drop on the most influential personages of the parliament; his allegations, however, appeared to be so absurd, that the king did not hesitate to confide the task of judging him to the counsellors.

Damiens appeared before the tribunal; he showed much firmness, resolution, and almost gayety. He was condemned to the same punishment as Ravillac, that is, to be quartered, with the aggravation of tortures by means of hot pincers and burning sulphur. He listened to the reading of this terrible judgment on his knees, and without allowing the least emotion to appear, and only said on rising, "The day will be a rough one." On the day of punishment he was conducted before the church of Notre Dame, to ask pardon, and then led to the place de Greve, where the judgment was executed.

The result of this affair was, that the king sought to connect himself closely with the parliament; he revoked the edicts which changed the organization of that body, permitted all the magistrates who had resigned, to resume their places, took measures to conquer the obstinacy of the archbishop of Paris and the Molinist curates, concerning the refusal of the sacraments, and announced openly that he abandoned the Jesuits. Thus the horizon was every where covered with black clouds, and announced the tempest which was about to fall upon the company of Jesus. The good fathers turned their looks to Rome and asked for aid. Benedict the Fourteenth, who had never dreamed of compromising his authority by avowing his connection with them, closed his ears to their complaints, and even made a hostile bull, which authorised Carvalho, marquis of Pombal, the first minister of Joseph, king of Portugal, to reform, at his pleasure, the abuses which the Jesuits had introduced into their colleges and establishments in that kingdom. This was the last act in the reign of Benedict the Fourteenth. He died on the 10th of May, 1758, aged eighty-three years, after a pontificate of eighteen years.

CLEMENT THE THIRTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SIXTH POPE.

[A. D. 1758.]

Election of Clement the Thirteenth—The character of the new pontiff—The Jesuits form a conspiracy and attempt to assassinate Joseph the First, king of Portugal—This prince drives them from his kingdom—Fraudulent bankruptcy of the Society of Jesus—The good fathers refuse to pay the debts of Father Lavallette—They are brought before parliament—Examination of the constitutions of their company—Their abolition in France—Protest of Clement the Thirteenth—New exile of the archbishop of Paris—The apostolic bull—Louis the Fifteenth threatens to seize on the Venaisin countship to avenge himself on the pope—The clergy preach a crusade against the philosophers—The Jesuits are driven from Spain and from the territories of France, Naples, Sicily, Malta, Placenza, and Parma—Clement fulminates bulls against the sovereigns who suppress them—He wishes to enforce the pretensions of the Holy See to Parma and Placenza—Quarrel between Rome and Venice—The abolition of the order of the Jesuits by the holy father every where demanded—Clement the Thirteenth is poisoned by them.

Forty-four cardinals composed the conclave which followed the death of Benedict the Fourteenth. His eminence, Monseigneur Archinto, who had exercised great influence during the last pontificate, received twenty-three votes on the first ballot; his party was then divided and reinforced the faction of Cavalehini, who obtained twenty-seven suffrages. But the French party rejected the nomination of this prelate, because he was affiliated with the Jesuits, and because he had contributed to the canonization of Bellarmine, that strong writer who, in his works, favoured regicide. They then fell into the ranks of the cardinal Passionei, then of Spinelli, and finally, into those of the Venetian Charles Rezzonico, who obtained a majority.

As soon as this cardinal found that he was elected, he uttered lamentable cries, shed tears, raised his eyes and arms to heaven, declared himself to be unworthy of so great an honour, and refused to clothe himself in the pontifical ornaments. He played the farce so perfectly, that the members of the conclave crowded around him to determine him to receive their adoration. As they could not stop him, one of them exclaimed, "Well, my lords, let us leave this brawler; there has been nothing done since he has not accepted the tiara; let us choose another pope." Which Rezzonico hearing, replied, "No, by God you shall not do that, for I accept it." Then wiping away his tears, he called his attendant to him, proceeded to his toilette, and was enthroned by the name of Clement the Thirteenth.

Charles Rezzonico, born at Venice, in 1693, was of a family originally from Como in the Milanese. He had been first assistant apostolical prothonotary, then auditor of the rota for the Venetians, and finally; cardinal.—Scarcely was he seated on the throne of St. Peter, when the new pontiff, who was secretly allied with the Jesuits, announced that he undertook the defence of the reverend fathers against the French philosophers, and that he was determined to make no concession to the ideas of the age. The disciples of Ignatius Loyola then conceived the hope of triumphing over their enemies, and solicited from the court of Rome the revocation of the brief of Benedict the Fourteenth in regard to affairs in Portugal.

The cardinal Saldanha, who had been appointed apostolic commissary to execute the bull, had already commenced his examination of the establishments of the good fathers, had satisfied himself that they were engaged in trade, and had seized, in the name of the king, on their warehouses, merchandize, bills of exchange, and commercial books. But all that did not discourage the Jesuits; they thought of drawing off the attention of the king and of the marquis Pombal to other matters; they declaimed against a commercial society which was invested with the exclusive privilege of trading in the wines of Oporto, and fomented troubles in several provinces, under pretext of claiming a suppression of the monopoly.

These tactics having only succeeded in causing their colleges to be closed, they changed their batteries, and prepared, in the dark, to strike a terrible blow, which was to restore to them all their influence in Portugal. Among the members of the company was one named Gabriel Malagrida, an ignorant fanatic, who, in order to obtain access to the palaces of lords and princes, pretended to be in direct communication with Jesus Christ, and gave himself out as being the object of the particular predilection of the Virgin. This impostor counted among his penitents, the marchioness of Tavora, a haughty and ambitious woman, who was enraged at the disgrace which had overtaken her husband, the former viceroy of the Indies.

Father Malagrida perceived the advantage he might derive from the exasperation of this woman; he flattered her hatred, brought religion and vanity to play, encouraged her in her thoughts of vengeance, and satisfied her as to the consequences of a crime which was fermenting in her head; with the assistance of John Mathoz and Alexander Souza, two of his brethren, he proved to her that a Christian could not do any thing more agreeable to the Divinity than kill a king, and that there were no sins or crimes which were not ransomed by a regicide. The marchioness was convinced, adhered to her plan of conspiracy, and sought for accomplices. She brought into her plot, Joseph Mascarenhas, duke of Aveiro, the ex-minister of John the Fifth, who had fallen into disgrace since the advent of Joseph to the throne; she also opened herself to her husband, who was the director general of all the cavalry of the kingdom, and counsellor of war, to Louis Bernard and Joseph Maria de Tavora, her sons, to Don Jerome d'Ataide, her son-in-law, an officer of the palace guard, and to her daughter, who was the mistress of the monarch.

Different meetings of the conspirators took place at St. Antoine and St. Roch, two houses belonging to the Jesuits, in order to agree upon the means of putting their criminal plan into execution; and when all the dispositions had been made, one night when Joseph was going alone from his royal residence of Quintado Mego to the residence of Quintado Cima, to a love rendezvous, Mascarenhas, duke of Aveiro, accompanied by two bravos, sallied from an ambuscade and fired upon the postilion who drove the king. The piece having hung fire, the postilion whipped up his horses and left them at a gallop; the two bravoes hurried on in pursuit of the carriage, discharged their carbines at it, and returned into the woods, so as to leave the other conspirators, who were posted farther along the route, the care of finishing the work. Things did not turn out as they had hoped; Joseph, wounded by two balls, and losing much blood, gave orders to the postilion to retrace his steps, and to take him to Junquiere, which saved him from certain death.

On the next day, thanks to the activity of the marquis de Pombal, all the culprits were soon in the hands of justice. The whole family of the Tavoras perished on the scaffold, with the exception of the young countess Ataide, who was only confined in a convent.

All went on well, so long as the minister had only to judge the lords who had embarked in the conspiracy; it was not the same when he wished to proceed against the Jesuits.

The secular judges refused to cite before them the fathers Malagrida, Souza, and Mathoz, whose instrumentality had been proved during the trial of the first accused, and declared that they had no authority to take cognizance of a crime committed by priests. The minister wished to frame an extraordinary tribunal to judge them, but the bishops protested, and the accused appealed to the pope. Joseph the First then issued a decree of banishment against the Jesuits as traitors, rebels, enemies to, and aggressors on, his person, his states, and the public peace, and the general good of the people. He confiscated their property, arrested them all, and shipped them on vessels which had orders to land them in Italy. The three culprits were alone detained at Lisbon, in the dungeons of the palace, awaiting the decision of the pontiff.

Not only was Clement the Thirteenth unwilling to authorise the proceedings against the Jesuits, but he even threatened Joseph and his minister with all his wrath, if he did not immediately revoke the decree against the society. This excess of audacity determined the king to break openly with the court of Rome, and to recall his ambassadors; and, as he dared not violate the privileges of the regular clergy by judging Malagrida as a regicide, notwithstanding the prohibition of the pope, he handed him over to the Dominicans, the natural enemies of the Jesuits, who burned him alive as a heretic, a visionary, and a false prophet. His two acolytes were merely condemned to imprisonment for life.

Throughout all Europe, and particularly in France, the Jansenists, the philosophers, and the magistrates, applauded this energetic proceeding of Joseph the First, and sought to excite all the governors to imitate his example by driving out the Jesuits. The latter, instead of replying to the attacks of their enemies, and taking measures to escape the danger, whether they were struck by a sort of blindness, or whether they were tired of their incessant strife with parliament, allowed things to go on. They soon came to the aid of their adversaries, and furnished them with an opportunity of destroying them in public opinion, and of annihilating them.

A French Jesuit, named Father Lavalette, had been sent by his superiors to Martinique, in the capacity of curate to a small village, and had become the superior or rector of their house in Martinique. By his financial skill he had increased the wealth of the community considerably, and controlled all the commerce of the islands. A rich banking house in Marseilles, the brothers Lioncy and Gouffre, had been charged by Father Sacy, advocate general of the Windward islands, and Father Forestier, the provincial of France, to accept all bills of exchange under the tacit guarantee of the society. This prosperity was to have an end, several ships sent by the reverend father to brothers Lioncy and Gouffre, to cover a sum of two millions of franca, or bills of exchange which they had accepted, were unfortunately captured by the English. This incident compelled the banking house to address themselves to Fathers Sacy and Forestier, as well as to the general of the order, for a reimbursement of the advances. They replied that the statutes of the order authorised superiors to disavow their inferiors, when any injury might result to the society from acknowledging their engagements. One of the brothers Gouffre went immediately to Paris to interest the dignitaries of the company in favour of his house. To all his entreaties, reasonings, and solicitations, the good fathers had but one reply, "The statutes of the order are inflexible, we can do nothing for you." It was in vain that he sought to move them, by telling them that his house would be forced to stop payment, and that he and his associates would not survive their ruin, and that they would be the cause of their suicide. The reverends replied to him very tranquilly, "That they would celebrate masses for the repose of their souls."

The Marseilles banker left Paris, returned to his associates, and announced to them the sad result of his mission. These unfortunate bankers, having no means of meeting their engagements, stopped payment, and surrendered all they possessed. The syndics of the creditors made immediate preparations to follow up Father Lavalette. The latter, in his turn, failed for four millions of franca, so as to frustrate the lawful rights of the creditors of Lioncy and Gouffre to the possessions of the Jesuits in the islands. Then arose a cry of outrage, and the syndics, without losing time, sued the whole Society of Jesus. By a decree of the council, the king sent the whole affair before the parliament of Paris, who were pleased to see their enemies brought before their bar on a charge of fraudulent bankruptcy.

The disciples of Loyola accepted the jurisdiction, thinking to entrench themselves behind their constitutions, and to deny their participation in, and consequently their being bound for the operations of Father Lavalette; they committed a still greater fault in surrendering the mysterious acts of their order to strengthen their reasons. As the examination of these constitutions was a long work, the parliament first made a decree against the company, declaring it to be one and indivisible, under the orders of its general, and condemning it to pay the amount of the bills of exchange drawn by Father Lavalette on the house of the brothers Lioncy and Gouffre of Marseilles.

This decree showed the Jesuits the mistake they had made in allowing things to go so far; they immediately went to work to execute the decree in its full tenor, so as to hush up the affair and prevent a greater evil. It was too late; the examination of the famous statutes of the company, had produced alarm and consternation among all classes in society, and their expulsion was demanded from all quarters.

The duke de Choiseul, and the marchioness de Pompadour, delighted at finding a mode of diverting the attention of the people from their persons, and of making a useful diversion from the frightful disorders they had brought on France, encouraged the hostile manifestations to the Jesuits, and even united with their enemies. The congregation endeavoured to allay the storm, and obtained, through the influence of the apostolic nuncio, that a council of fifty bishops should be commissioned to examine their statutes. As was to be expected, the prelates declared that the constitutions of the society contained nothing reprehensible, and decided that there was no reason to prosecute them.

The parliament, urged on by the minister Choiseul, refused to register the edict, and sustained its opposition by such powerful motives, that Louis the Fifteenth was compelled to yield to the opinions of the magistrates, and surrender to them the decision of this important affair. The parliament again took hold of the proceeding, and after some months of inquiries and pleadings, made a decree, which pronounced the doctrines and practices of the Jesuits "as perverse, destructive of every principle of religion, and even of probity; as injurious to Christian morality, pernicious to civil society, seditious, dangerous to the rights of the nation, the nature of the royal power, and the safety of the persons of sovereigns; as fit to excite the greatest troubles in states, to form and maintain the most profound corruption in the hearts of men; it accordingly ordered that the institution of the Jesuits should for ever cease to exist throughout the whole extent of the kingdom; it prohibited the subjects of the king from proposing, soliciting, and demanding at any time, or on any occasion, the recall of the society; nor of frequenting the colleges, boarding-houses, seminaries, retreats and congregations of the infamous fraternity; it enjoined on the disciples of Loyola to abandon all the schools, professed houses, novitiates, residences, missions, and other establishments, under what rule soever they were, and to retire into whatever part of the kingdom they pleased, to reside there under the ordinary authority, with an injunction of not living in common, nor of longer recognising the authority of the general, nor of wearing a religious dress."

In its judgment, the parliament passed in review all the decrees published in France, as well in favour of the society as against it, the first to show that the Jesuits had always surpassed the limits of the concessions granted to them; the second to prove that they have constantly given ground for just complaints and grievous recriminations. The act of condemnation related the principal works of the good fathers, which were cited as extremely dangerous, on account of the doctrines they taught concerning simony, blasphemy, magic, witchcraft, astrology, irreligion, idolatry, impurity, false witness, adultery, incest, sodomy, robbery, suicide, murder, parricide and regicide. It finally concluded with a list of the kings, princes, bishops, and popes murdered or poisoned by the disciples of Loyola.

His holiness, in order to counterbalance the decision of parliament, assembled in secret consistory, the cardinals who were devoted to the institution; and after having made a violent address to them against the princes, ministers, magistrates, Jansenists, and philosophers of France, read them a protest written entirely by his own hand as follows:—

"We, Clement the Thirteenth, the vicar of Christ, successor of the apostle, in the infallibility of our intelligence, condemn, reprove, and curse all that the French magistrates have attempted against religion, the universal church, the Holy Apostolic See, and the pontifical constitutions, by proscribing the constitutions of Jesus. We, moreover, declare, decree, and ordain, by the force of this solemn and consistorial statute, that all the mandates, judgments, decrees, ordinances, sentences, and declarations emanating from the laical power of the kingdom of France, in regard to the extinction and dissolution of the said Society of Jesus, have been, are, and always shall be, null, inefficacious, invalid, and entirely destitute of all lawful effect. We affirm that no one shall be obliged to observe them, although he had bound himself by oath to do so. Thus, of our own motion and certain knowledge, and by the plenitude of our power, we disapprove, annul, erase, and annihilate all those injurious and barbarous acts, and we protest before Christ of their manifest nullity, reserving to ourselves to give the most ample proofs of their repeal, annihilation, abolition and abrogation, as soon as we can do so without danger to the church."

Clement the Thirteenth sent a part of this protest to the French clergy, in a confidential brief, in which he enjoined on the prelates to carry on a rough war with the parliament, whilst treating with respect the court and the king, who could not delay long, he said, to recognise that the Jesuits were the best auxiliaries of despotism.

His majesty, Louis the Fifteenth, had already for a long time known this, for the cardinal de Fleury had not ceased to repeat to him in his youth:—"Sire, the Jesuits are wretches, and you can, however, make useful instruments of them, the better to oppress the people and assure your sway." Thus the king had tolerated, rather than approved, out of regard for the favourite, the act of parliament which annihilated the Society of Jesus.

He had even had some feelings of remorse for the expulsion of the Loyolists, for he had proposed to the sovereign pontiff, to reinstate the congregation in his kingdom, under the sole condition, that the members should introduce some modifications concerning regicide into their constitutions. But the fiery Clement the Thirteenth, had brutally repulsed his advances, by saying that the Jesuits should remain as they had always been, or they should not exist at all, and compulsion had been laid on Louis the Fifteenth, to give his sanction to the decree of parliament, and to declare by an edict, dated from Versailles, that it was his pleasure that the society should no longer exist in his kingdom, nor in the territories or lordships which were obedient to him.

The archbishop of Paris, Christopher de Beaumont, wished to make opposition, and censure the acts of government in his pastoral instructions. All that he gained by it was a second decree of parliament, which condemned his mandamus to be burned, and an order from the king, which sent him into exile and confined him in the abbey of la Trappe.

The expulsion of the four thousand Jesuits, who infested the capital, and the banishment of the archbishop of Paris, raised the irritation of Clement the Thirteenth to its height. His holiness, not knowing how better to oppose what he called the general fermentation of the governments, lanced the bull "Apostolicum pascendi murus," filled with praises for the black cohorts of the Jesuits, and with injuries and outrages for their enemies. The parliament of Paris suppressed this bull, on the strong conclusions of the advocate Joly de Fleury, and prohibited its being printed in France. The parliament of Aix acted with still more firmness; it had it torn up by the executioner and publicly burned, and, moreover, it invited Louis the Fifteenth to seize on the Venaissin countship, to avenge himself on the court of Rome and the pope.

His majesty, stimulated by the marchioness de Pompadour, appeared well disposed to use great rigour, and appeared only to wait an opportunity to seize the city of Avignon, when the almost sudden death of the favourite turned him aside from this plan, and freed the Jesuits from their most formidable foe. The clergy resumed courage, intrigued around the monarch, and obtained authority to convene a synod, to decide on what measures it was useful to take, in order to put an end to the disputes between the civil and religious powers.

In consequence of this authority, thirty-two archbishops or bishops, and thirty-six deputies of the second order in the ecclesiastical hierarchy assembled in council in the capital, and fulminated anathemas against the principal works of the philosophers, amongst others, against the Encyclopædia, the Analysis of Bayle, the Book of the Mind, by Helvetius, Emile, the Social Contract, the Letters from the Mountain, of Jean Jacques Rousseau, the Essay on Morals, the Philosophical Dictionary, the Philosophy of History, and the Oriental Despotism by Voltaire.

They then declared that the church alone had the right to teach and instruct children; that it alone could judge in matters of doctrine, and fix the degree of submission which was due to them; that it alone, by virtue of the assistance of Jesus Christ, could regulate articles of belief; that it alone had the right to pronounce on the excellence of the religious orders, to declare them suppressed, or to sus-tain them; that the administration of the sacraments appertained to Catholic priests alone; that the civil authority could in no way go against the canon laws, nor force the ministers of religion to administer the sacraments to sinners whom they thought unworthy to receive it. Finally, they declared that the bull "Unigenitus" was binding on all the faithful of the kingdom of France.

The parliament erased the acts of this ecclesiastical assembly as derogatory to the authority of the government, and prohibited the citizens from paying regard to them. The clerical dignitaries, who were a part of this council, went immediately to Versailles, cast themselves at the feet of Louis the Fifteenth, and obtained an edict which annulled the decree of parliament.

This first victory emboldened the ecclesiastics; they raised their heads proudly every where, publicly panegyrised the archbishop of Paris, and announced the approaching recall of the Jesuits. The marshal Richelieu and the duke d'Aiguillon, his nephew, the secret enemies of the prime minister, the duke de Choiseul, intrigued for the good fathers, and announced that the reign of confessors was about to succeed that of mistresses. His majesty himself was seized with an holy fervour for religious exercises, and had even closed the royal lupanar called the Parc-aux-cerfs. This new caprice of the monarch lasted, however, but a short time, a demoiselle de Romans attracted his attention, and prevented him from amending his life. The parliament took advantage of this circumstance to arrest the encroachments of the Jesuits. It published a decree, which made the law of silence concerning religious matters as binding on the clergy as the laity; it prosecuted the priests who persisted in refusing the sacraments; it enjoined on the bishops who held cabals in Paris, to return to their dioceses, under penalty of a seizure of their temporalities, and took energetic measures against the disciples of Ignatius Loyola.

From this period, the history of the congregation of Jesus is but a registry of a long train of disasters; already expelled from China and Portugal, the good fathers found themselves arrested in one day throughout all Spain, by order of Charles the Third, and conducted by officers to different sea ports and sent to Italy.

France did not long delay in imitating the example of Spain, and drove beyond the mountains, the cohorts of Jesuits who infested the provinces. The king of the Two Sicilies also drove them from his dominions. Don Ferdinand, the Duke of Parma and Placenza, infant of Spain, followed the political impulse of his family, and extirpated them from his domains. The soil of Italy was polluted by this unclean slime which the nations had rejected, and which they had sent back to Rome, the fountain of all corruption.

The pope was soon alarmed by the prodigious number of Jesuits which fell upon the patrimony of St. Peter, as upon a prey which belonged to them; and to place his provinces beyond the reach of a certain devastation, he crowded them on the neighbouring territories.

His holiness, however, lanced a bull of excommunication against the kings who persecuted the members of the congregation, and threatened with his vengeance the princes who should maintain the decree of proscription with which the disciples of Ignatius Loyola had been struck. He even wished to join the execution to the threat; he began with the duke of Parma, who was the least formidable of his adversaries, summoned him to restore the duchies of Parma and Placenza to the Holy See, and sent troops to sustain his claim.

The kings of France, Spain, Naples, and Portugal, who were united by the family compact, pronounced loudly against the court of Rome, and prepared to punish the outrage done them in the person of a prince of their house. Louis the Fifteenth, by the advice of the duke de Choiseul, sent troops to Avignon and seized on the Venaissin territory. The young Ferdinand the Fourth, the king of the Two Sicilies, invaded the province of Beneventum, which he occupied with his troops; the courts of Parma, Madrid, and Lisbon, and the parliament of Paris caused the bull of Clement to be torn up.

His holiness then sought assistance in Austria, and asked for aid from Maria Theresa, but the empress, discontented with the Jesuits, who, on a recent occasion, had betrayed her secrets to the court of Rome, did not even deign to reply to him, and caused the famous bull, "In Cœna Domini," to be suppressed in her dutchy of Milan. The pope, repulsed on all sides, and being without allies, humbled his pride, declared that he was ready to make concessions, and implored the clemency of the sovereigns.

But the impulse was given, and his tardy submission could not prevent the progress of the reform. The Catholic powers continued to trace out, definitely, the line of demarcation between the spiritual and temporal power, and made it a condition of peace that the pope should suppress the institution of the Jesuits. Clement, too weak to resist the princes of the house of Bourbon, determined, finally, to sacrifice the satellites of the papacy, and announced that he would pronounce the abolition of the society in a public consistory. This imprudent declaration was the cause of his death; the good fathers were on their guard, and on the night preceding the day appointed for this solemn act of justice, the holy father was seized with strange pains, and expired in convulsions at four o'clock on the morning of the 2d of February, 1769. The Jesuits had poisoned him.

CLEMENT THE FOURTEENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-SEVENTH POPE.

[A. D. 1769.]

Election of the virtuous Ganganelli—The details of his life before his elevation to the pontifical throne—His projects of reform in the church—The Jesuits threaten him with the fate of his predecessor, if he dare to touch their order—He makes peace with all the powers—Representations of the French clergy to Louis the Fifteenth, concerning the progress of philosophy—The encyclopedists follow up their victory—Clement the Fourteenth suppresses the society of the Jesuits throughout Christendom—Arrest of the general of the Jesuits, Lorenzo Ricci, and of the principal chiefs of the order—Frightful vengeance taken by the Jesuits on the unfortunate pontiff—He dies poisoned.

FORTY-SEVEN cardinals opened the conclave to give a successor to Clement the Thirteenth. From the first, the electors were divided into two parties, equally powerful; the one, those who were affiliated with the Jesuits, wished to give him a successor capable of walking in the footsteps of Gregory the Seventh and Pius the Fifth; the others, who were sold to the courts of France and Spain, wished to place the tiara on the head of a pope who was conciliatory enough to restore harmony between the altar and the throne. The intrigues lasted for three months; at last the Franciscan John Vincent Anthony Ganganelli, obtained the suffrages of the majority, and was proclaimed head of the church by the name of Clement the Fourteenth.

The new pope had scarcely attained his sixty-fourth year. He was born in the small town of St. Archangelo, near Rimini, where his father was a physician. From his tenderest infancy, he had shown a decided predilection for meditation, which had determined his family to enter him in a convent of the order of St. Francis, where he was distinguished for his virtues. He left it to be raised to the post of adviser to the holy office by Benedict the Fourteenth; during the following reign he obtained the hat of a cardinal.

Ganganelli preserved, beneath the tiara, the same morals as under the cowl of the Franciscan; he studied to remain humble and charitable, and took great pains to preserve the frugal and studious habits, which had been the charm of his existence. Never, since Titus Trajan and Marcus Aurelius, had a sovereign been endowed with a nobler character, a finer soul, a more judicious mind, commanded in Rome. His first act of authority was to remove from his court, the ministers of his predecessor; he then announced that he wished to restore peace to the church and reform Christianity.

The consternation was great among the cardinals, bishops, priests, and monkish mob, who grew fat in idleness on the sweat of the unfortunate. All rose in mass against him, and endeavoured to make him renounce his generous projects by terrible threats. A Jesuit dared to post up in open day, on the principal entrance to the Vatican, a placard containing these words: "Pray for the pope, who is about to die." Another fanatic placed on his table a billet which contained these four letters: "P. S. S. V.," which the pope thus explained: "Presto sarà sede vacante,—the Holy see will soon be vacant."

Clement, unshakeable in his resolution, paid no attention to the complaints, curses, or threats of the ecclesiastics. He walked with a firm step in the path he had marked out. The finances were in extreme disorder in consequence of the depredations of his predecessors; he changed the treasury officers, diminished the number of charges which weighed upon the treasury, and solaced the people. Industry and the arts were languishing; commerce and agriculture were in a deplorable state; he established manufactures, repaired the public buildings, drained the Pontine marshes, founded the rich museum which bears his name, provided for the expenses of nunciature and missions, for the payment of troops and artists, and paid regularly the pensions which were chargeable on the Holy See. All these internal matters arranged, he turned his attention to the external. The political horizon was dark with clouds; the irritation of the crowned heads had been carried to the highest point by the brief of Clement the Thirteenth against the duke of Parma, and by a new attempt made by the Jesuits to assassinate the king of Portugal. That monarch even announced his intention to appoint a patriarch independent of the pope, so as to finish matters with the court of Rome at a blow. Clement the Fourteenth commenced by renewing relations with the courts of France and Spain; he caused it to be skilfully insinuated to them, that the papacy was the basis on which the absolute authority of the Catholic princes reposed; that it was their interest to defend it, saving to restrain the privileges which their ancestors, right or wrong, had granted to the successors of the apostles, and which they regarded as incompatible with their dignity. Then, to join example to precept, he abrogated the famous bull "In Cœna Domini," and annulled all the decrees of the council of Trent, and the popes regarding it; desisted, in theory and practice, from all pretensions to temporal authority over princes, and gave pledges of his sincerity. This conduct brought back to him all minds; France restored to him the Venaisian territory, and the king of Naples, Beneventum and Ponte Corvo.

The princes of the houses of Braganza and Bourbon did not, however, depart from their rigour on the subject of the Jesuits, and urgently claimed the suppression of the order. Clement the Fourteenth, like a prudent man, replied, that before accomplishing so solemn an act as the abrogation of an order which counted its members by thousands, and which had ramifications in all parts of the world, he must first, inform himself as to the causes which might justify his decision in the eyes of posterity. From that time the pope enveloped himself in an impenetrable mystery; he studied, with scrupulous attention, the statutes, rules, acts, and history of the society; he appointed apostolical visitors to examine into the administration of the property of their colleges, and expert accountants to establish the reports of their monstrous wealth.

Clement was not, however, so absorbed in this affair as to be unable to play his part of pope, and lanch bulls of excommunication against Diderot, d'Alembert, Voltaire, Helvetius, Jean Jacques Rousseau, Marmontel, and Holbach. The French clergy naturally took the side of the pope against the philosophers; the parliaments cowardly turned against those who had aided them in triumphing over the Jesuits, and authorised the bishops of the kingdom to meet at Paris to judge the works which had been censured by the court of Rome. This assembly of prelates drew up its formula in the following terms: "Most dreadful Sire—Impiety does not confine itself to attacks on the church; it attacks at once the sanctuary and the empire, and announces that it will never be satisfied until it has annihilated all divine and human power. If your majesty doubts this sad truth, we will hasten to furnish you proof of it, by placing before you a work recently published, called the 'System of Nature.' The author of this production, the most criminal that the human mind has probably ever given birth to, does not think that he has done enough evil to men by teaching them that there is no revealed religion, and that hell is a hideous and absurd chimera, which owes its origin to the knavery of priests; he even dares to turn his attention upon societies, and the heads who govern them; he announces that he only perceives in the different states a vile assemblage of cowardly or corrupt men prostrated before bishops who rob them, or princes who oppress them. He says that the heads of nations are all infamous usurpers, who sacrifice the people to execrable passions, and who do not arrogate to themselves the proud titles of representatives of God, but to exercise with the more impunity an odious despotism over the human race; he says that the agreement between the priesthood and the sovereign power is a sacrilegious compact between knavery and force. He dares to deny that the authority of kings is of divine right; he maintains that the people may demand an account from them, of the management of affairs, and even, excess of audacity, deprive them of their life and crown, if they discover that they have abused the supreme authority. Be careful, sire; such principles are of a nature to please the imagination, are propagated with extreme rapidity, and the inevitable consequences will be, the emancipation of the human race, and the ruin of the throne and the altar."

"Who would, however, believe it, sire! This dangerous, impious book, is sold in your capital, at the very gates of your palace; soon it will penetrate to the very extremities of the empire, and will spread the germs of liberty in the heart, that formidable foe to all. And the laws are silent—and the tranquil authorities do not dream of wresting from the hands of your subjects this monstrous collection of blasphemies. Do not suffer such an outrage any longer, oh, well-beloved prince! Arrest the progress of human reason! Enchain that spirit of independence which has so often overthrown thrones; repress these outbreaks of a delirious imagination which revel in equality among men, or tremble for the future kings of your race."

The requisitions of the magistracy were joined to the representations of the episcopate. The advocate general Segnier was instructed to prosecute the philosophers before parliament, and expressed himself thus: "An impious and audacious sect has decorated its false wisdom with the name of philosophy; its partizans have erected themselves into preceptors of the human race, and seek to overthrow the altar and the throne. Their rallying cry is, 'The freedom of the press;' and to make their device triumphant, they have placed themselves at the head of the skeptics, and displayed the standard of revolt. If then, we wish to guarantee our privileges from the attacks of these dangerous doctrines, which threaten to throw society into confusion, under the pretext of reforming abuses; we must be severe against these works, we must annihilate them, we must efface even the recollection of them."

In conformity with the furious conclusions of the advocate general, the parliament, by a decree of the 16th of August, 1770, condemned to be burned, the works which were denounced to it by the assembly of the clergy; the System of Nature, Hell Destroyed, the Sacred Contagion, the Examination of the Prophecies which serve for the foundation of Religion, Christianity Unveiled, God and Men, Treatise on the Miracles of Jesus Christ, the Philosophical Collection, Critical Examination of the Apologists for the Christian Religion, and the Impartial Examination of the Principal Religions of the World. These works were attributed to Damilaville, Diderot, Voltaire, and the celebrated baron d'Holbach, whose house, according to the expression of Grimm, was one of the pleasantest hospitals of the initiated of the Encyclopædia; it was called "the synagogue" by the priests, who called that of Madame Neckar "the parish church;" there met the abbé Chancelin, the count d'Argental, Miraud, Mirabeau, Foncomange, and many other disciples of Voltaire.

Thanks to the imprudent conduct of parliament, the Jesuits appeared to be once more on the eve of resuming their former preponderance; the magistrates had stupidly aided the clergy in their struggle with the philosophers. The clergy, whose interests drew them towards the Society of Jesus, made in their turn common cause with the disciples of Ignatius Loyola, and intrigued so skilfully that finally the well-beloved Louis the Fifteenth closed the parliament.

The king, yielding to the solicitations of the new favourite, the countess du Barry, who was herself the instrument of the chancellor Maupéou, the tool of the Jesuits, announced his desire to recognise the company, and informed the court of Rome of his intentions. The sovereign pontiff wrote at once to the monarch, beseeching him to allow things to remain as they were, until after the judgment which he was about to render concerning the society.

Clement the Fourteenth continued his minute inquiry, regardless of the threats or obstacles of every kind which he met on his way. He had, however, judged it prudent to take certain precautions to avoid the terrible fate of his predecessor. Thus he had replaced the cook of the Quirinal palace by a good monk, named Francis, who, from devotion to him, had consented to serve as his cook and prepare the dishes destined for his table.

Nothing could intimidate the virtuous Ganganelli, and when, after four years of close inquiries, he found himself sufficiently enlightened concerning the crimes of the congregation, he lanced the celebrated bull "Domini ac Redemptor." The decree which abolished the society was thus framed, "Inspired by the Holy Spirit, urged on by the duty of bringing back concord into the bosom of the church, convinced that the congregation of the Jesuits can no longer render the services for which our predecessor, Paul the Third, instituted them, induced, moreover, by other motives which morality commands us to confine in our own soul, by virtue of our sovereign authority in religious matters, we abolish and for ever destroy the Society of Jesus, its functions, its houses, and its institutions." In signing this bull, Clement said with a sigh, "I sign my death warrant, but I obey my conscience."

This sentence was immediately notified to the professed house, and the other colleges, by the deputies of the commission of inquiry. To prevent all rebellion, his holiness arrested the general of the order, Laurenzo Ricci, his assistants, the secretary general, Fathers Faure, Forestier, and Guatier, who were conducted to the castle of San Angelo. From that time Clement redoubled his precautions to free himself from the vengeance of his enemies, and renewed his recommendations to the good Franciscan to watch the kitchen—"Fra Francisco," he said to him, "cadate a la pignata,"—"Brother Francis, watch the pot." The active prudence of the good monk did not disconcert the Jesuits, it only rendered them more ingenious. The following was the infernal trick they employed to attain their ends. A lady of the Sabine, entirely devoted to them, had a tree in her garden which bore the handsomest figs in Rome. The reverend fathers, knowing that the pope loved this fruit very much, induced the lady to disguise herself as a peasant and go and present these figs to Brother Francis. The devotees did so several times, gained the confidence of the Franciscan, and one day slipped into the basket a fig larger than the others, into which a subtle poison, called aquetta, was injected. Up to this time the holy father had enjoyed perfect health; he was well made, though of the ordinary height; his voice was sonorous and strong; he walked with the activity of a young man, and every thing presaged a long old age to him.

From that day his health failed in an extraordinary manner; it was remarked with alarm, that his voice was sensibly failing. To those first symptoms of his sickness was joined so violent an inflammation of his throat that he was obliged to keep his mouth constantly open; vomiting then succeeded the inflammation, accompanied by pains in his bowels; finally, the sickness increasing in intensity, he discovered that he was poisoned. He wished to make use of antidotes, but it was too late, the evil was beyond remedy, and he had only to wait the close of his life. For the three months that he endured this terrible agony, his courage never failed him for a moment; one day only, after a more violent crisis than all the others, he said, "Alas, I knew well that they would poison me, but I did not expect to die in so slow and cruel a manner." He became, if we may so speak, the shadow of himself; his flesh was eaten out by the corrosive action of the aquetta, his very bones were attacked and became softened, contorting his members and giving them a hideous form; at last, God took pity on the poor victim of the execrable Jesuits, and recalled him to himself, on the 22d of September, 1774, at seven and a half o'clock in the morning.

An authentic piece, the despatch of the ambassador of Spain, relates in its fullest details, the examination of the dead body, which was made the day succeeding his death, and adds to the irrefutable proofs of the poisoning of the pontiff and the guilt of the Jesuits.

Thus were realised the threats of the Jesuits, and their sinister predictions were accomplished!

PIUS THE SIXTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-EIGHTH POPE.

[A. D. 1774.]

Simoniacal election of Pius the Sixth—Execrable character of the new head of the church—His infamous morals—He maintains the decrees of Clement the Fourteenth concerning the Jesuits, in order to seize on their wealth—By way of compensation, he authorises them to found establishments in Russia and Prussia, and at Liege—Louis the Sixteenth, the pupil of the Jesuits, renews the decrees of his predecessor against them—The nobility, clergy, and parliaments, league against the philosophers—Brief of the holy father against the Jews—Draining of the Pontine marshes—Nepotism of Pius the Sixth—His incests—He renews the crimes of the Borgias, and marries his bastard to his daughter—Frightful debauchery of the pontifical family—Prodigalities of the holy father towards his minions and bastards—Quarrel between the courts of Rome and Vienna—Joseph the Second brings about useful reforms among the clergy of his dominions—His holiness goes to the court of the emperor of Germany to convert him—Pontifical farce—Pius the Sixth fails in his efforts, and returns to Rome—Saturnalia at the Vatican—Spoliations of the pontiff—Scandalous lawsuit between the pope and the marchioness Lepri—Congress of Ems, and separation of the church of Germany from the Holy See—All the powers declare themselves hostile to the court of Rome—Ecclesiastical reforms in the dutchy of Tuscany—Scipio Ricci and the Dominicans of Pistoia—Pius the Sixth anathematizes the prelate Scipio Ricci—Abolition of the inquisition at Naples—Revolutionary movement in France—Suit of the cardinal de Rohan—Ministry of the archbishop of Brienne—Louis the Sixteenth opens the states-general—Civil constitution of the clergy—The constitutional bishops—The pope fulminates bulls against the constituent assembly—Revolution in the Venaisin territory—Pius the Sixth massacres the inhabitants of Avignon—He persecutes the French at Rome—Condemnation of Cagliostro—Louis the Sixteenth refuses to sanction the laws concerning the ecclesiastics—The kings of Europe and the pope form a confederacy against the French—The nobles and priests emigrate into Italy and England—Proclamation of the republic in France—The French government intimates to the pope to set at liberty the the citizens who were retained as prisoners—Pius the Sixth massacres the citizen Basseville—Judgment and condemnation of Louis the Sixteenth—The pope causes all the French found in his dominions to be arrested—Outbreak at Rome—Pius the Sixth arms against France—Bonaparte in Italy—Armistice between the Holy See and the republic—Perfidies of the pope—Miracles of the madonnas—Massacre of the French in Italy—Feats of Tolentino—The pope murders the Romans—Murder of General Duphot—Revolution at Rome—Pius the Sixth is exiled to Florence—From that city his holiness organises massacres at Rome and Naples—He is transferred to Valence in Dauphiny—His death.

WHEN the funeral of the unfortunate Ganelli was over, the cardinals entered into the conclave to give him a successor. As in the last elections, two great parties were at once formed, that of the crowns, and that of the Zelanti, or the prelates sold to the Jesuits. At the head of this last party were the cardinals John Baptiste Rezzonico, Castelli, and Buffalini; the other was governed by the ministers of the courts of France and Spain, the cardinal Bernis, and Monino, count of Florida Blanca. The Zelanti at first proposed as their candidate the imperious Mark Anthony Colonna, who was at once rejected by Bernis; the French ambassador, in his turn, presented Negroni, showing that he did not belong to any party, that he was sprung from an humble condition, and that he had all the guarantees of wisdom and probity that could be sought for in a pontiff. But the Zelanti cried out against this choice. "We do not wish another beggar," they said to Cardinal Bernis, "and now we will prevent the election of a mendicant," wishing to designate the virtuous Clement the Fourteenth by these outrageous epithets.

The faction of the crowns proposed in succession Palavicini, who was rejected on account of his tolerance, and Visconti, who was objected to on account of his rigidity. The partizans of the Jesuits then presented Castelli, who was opposed as too immoral, and Boschi, who was rejected as too fanatical. The holy assembly consumed five months in warping, or undoing the warps which each competitor set at work to filch the tiara; sometimes the opposing cardinals did not confine themselves to epigrams, reproaches, nor insults, to conquer their adversaries; they even used brute force, and ignobly battered each other. Things went so far, that a censor afterwards composed a satirical piece on this meeting, called the Conclave, in which all the cardinals who took part in it, appeared on the scene in the truest and most grotesque manner.

From the turn which the elections took, the vacancy in the Holy See would have been beyond all doubt prolonged indefinitely, if the minister of Spain, Florida Blanca, had not conceived the happy idea of gaining over to his side the mistresses of the cardinals opposed to the party of the crowns, and making the Holy Spirit speak by the mouths of the handsomest courtezans of Rome. The gold of Spain and France was lavished on these queens of the conclave, who, in return, promised to support by secret advice to their lovers, the candidate who should be designated to them.

Bernis, informed of what was going on without, proposed as pope, John Angelo Braschi, one of the Zelanti, whom he believed to have been gained over to France; the other cardinals, who were secretly influenced by the Roman dames, were favourable to his promotion, and proclaimed him supreme head of the church, on the 14th of February, 1775, by the name of Pius the Sixth.

The cardinal Bernis at once announced this promotion to the court of France in the following note: "Braschi has been elevated to the chair of St. Peter; it is believed he will occupy it worthily; but I dare not answer for events which may result from certain circumstances which it is impossible to foresee, or from variations which a too great elevation produce by operating upon the character, the mind, and the habits of most men. God alone sees the depth of the heart, and we can only judge by appearances. The reign of the new pontiff will reveal whether, before his election, I saw his face or his mask."

One might, however, foresee what kind of a pope Pius the Sixth would be, from the explanation he gave concerning the name he chose on accepting the tiara. "Pius the Fifth is the last pope canonized by the church," said he, "I wish to walk in his footsteps." Alas, the execrable Braschi but too much resembled the sanguinary Dominican, the originator of the St. Bartholomew; like him, insatiable of sway, coldly cruel, implacable, proud; he only wanted the political genius of the ferocious Pius the Fifth, to complete the resemblance.

During his pontifical career Braschi was at once enterprising and irresolute, ambitious and pusillanimous, interested and prodigal, suspicious and careless, false in heart, and knavish in mind; with such a character he became, as he was, the sport of the courtiers who surrounded him. He abandoned all the affairs of government to his favourites, and contented himself with being enthroned in the Vatican, in order to exhibit the fine proportions of his imposing figure, with such a dramatic affectation, that strangers, who were present at the religious ceremonies at which his holiness officiated, asked if they saw a pontiff actor, or an actor pontiff.

Pius the Sixth attained his fifty-eighth year when he reached the throne of St. Peter; he was born of a noble, but poor family of the territory of Cesena. The cardinal Ruffo, the lover of the mother of the young Braschi, had been his first protector, and had opened the way for him to high ecclesiastical dignities, by procuring for him the appointment of private secretary to Benedict the Fourteenth. During the following reign he had exchanged that place for that of auditor, and then for that of treasurer of the apostolic chamber, which was one of the most important posts in the Roman government. Under Clement the Fourteenth, serious accusations of concussions drove him from his place, but as the virtuous Ganganelli was an enemy to scandal, he spared him the disgrace of a public dismissal by giving him the hat. Braschi lived in a kind of disgrace until the death of his predecessor, making common cause with the Jesuits, concealing them in his palace, even conspiring with them, which induced the supposition that he was not a stranger to the crime which had terminated the existence of Clement the Fourteenth.

His morals were not more irreproachable than his administration; for Gorain, the author of "The Secret Memoirs of Italy," an extremely curious work, and one of high historical importance, formally accuses him of adultery, sodomy, and incest, and with him all cotemporary authors, except the stipendiaries of the priestly party, agree in saying, that the holy father led the life of a Sybarite, fulfilling none of his pontifical functions, confining himself to the celebration of mass in his oratory, or being enthroned for an hour at a solemn audience, and passing the rest of his time in getting drunk with his mistresses and his minions, whom he chose out of his own family.

On his advent to the chair of St. Peter, the new pontiff endeavoured to induce the Romans to forget his past extortions, and spared nothing to gain their affections; he distributed money to the poor, promised to diminish the imposts, and announced that he was about to carry into effect great reforms among the clergy. In fact, he dismissed a large number of prelates and ecclesiastics, convicted of malversation and peculation, from the employments they filled, but it was to give their functions to his relatives and creatures; he diminished the pensions granted to the great dignitaries of the church, but it was to increase by so much the more, his private fortune.

The people of Rome, usually so easily deceived, were not this time the dupes of the juggleries of the pope, and preserved for Pius the Sixth the hatred they had for Cardinal Braschi. His holiness, unable to gain the people, wished to find a support among the members of the sacred college, by flattering by turns, the two parties of the Zelanti and the crowns, which rendered his position extremely difficult through his whole pontificate, and frequently forced him to take the most contradictory measures, now under the inspiration of the courts of Madrid or Versailles, or under the dread of a threat of death from the Society of Jesus.

At first, the sovereign pontiff had appeared to lean towards the Zelanti, and had exhibited a disposition to repair the disasters of the congregation of St. Ignatius; he then reviewed his decision, and declared that he would maintain the dispositions taken towards them by Clement the Fourteenth, until the conclusion of the proceedings which had been commenced against them. The pretext for this change was the fear of drawing upon Rome the wrath of the kings of France and Spain, but his real motive was his desire to retain their wealth, which had been confiscated to the benefit of the Holy See.

By way of compensation, he permitted the good fathers to scatter pamphlets against the memory of Clement the Fourteenth, and he himself opposed the king of Spain, in regard to the canonization of a former bishop of Mexico, named John Palafox, one of the most ardent enemies of the Jesuits. The more Florida Blanca, the ambassador of his Catholic majesty, urged the court of Rome to place his protegee in the catalogue of the saints, the more did the pope exhibit hostility to this promotion, and seek to depreciate the merits of the Spanish bishop. A sort of quarrel of vanity was the result, and it reached such a point that Charles the Third was obliged to threaten him with his wrath to obtain an entrance for Bishop Palafox to the skies.

This small satisfaction given to the Loyolists made them resume patience, and even induced them to unite with the holy father to aid him in combatting the ideas of the reformers, which were invading all governments, and particularly Germany, where reigned Joseph the Second, one of the most terrible adversaries of the supremacy of the Holy See.

Through a continued reciprocity of kindness, Pius the Sixth rendered great honours to Lorenzo Ricci, the general of the order, who had died in the dungeons of San Angelo; and by a fresh contradiction, whilst maintaining the abrogation of the society, he authorised the Jesuits to spread themselves through Prussia and Russia, form schools, colleges, and professed houses, and even appointed to the prebend of the collegiate establishment of St. John the Baptist at Liege, a member of the congregation, the English Apton, who had the direction of the famous college of that city. Only to avoid showing too openly his contempt for the representations of the kings of France and Spain, he prohibited the disciples of Loyola from wearing the habit of their order.

This kind of hidden restoration excited the discontent of the princes of the house of Bourbon, and became the subject of representations which were addressed to the pontiff by Cardinal Bernis and Florida Blanca, in the name of Louis the Sixteenth, the new king of France, and of Charles the Third. His holiness did not content himself with denying his participation in what had been done, and sent to the two sovereigns a brief, in which he declared all the encroachments of the congregation in the Russian empire and the Prussian monarchy, to be null, abusive, and unlawful. The two monarchs, occupied with more serious interests, permitted the Jesuits to proclaim their approaching re-establishment, and to use, as trophies, the rescripts which the pope had granted them, and the authority which was given them to remain in every place in which the bull of Clement the Fourteenth had not been published, as they were before.

The disciples of Loyola availed themselves of this species of toleration to seek to retake root in France; they rallied the clergy to their side, and excited new persecutions against the philosophers. They caused to be condemned by an assembly of bishops entirely devoted to them, a number of remarkable works levelled against fanaticism, among others, Antiquity Unveiled by its Usages; the Sermon of the Fifty; Critical Examination of the Old and New Apologists for Religion; the Letters of Thrasybulus to Leusippus; the Social System; Questions on the Encyclopedia; Critical History of the Life of Jesus Christ; Common Sense; Philosophical and Political History of the Establishment of Europeans in the Two Indies, the Profession of the Faith of the Theists; the Dialogue of Evhemerus; the Canonization of St. Caoufin; Instructions &c

Brother Pedienloso; the Questions of Zapata; the Cry of Nations.

The nobility, which was no better treated than the church in the books of the philosophers, joined the clergy, and brought into play all the resources of Machiavelism and corruption, to have the condemnation of these works sustained by the new parliaments which Louis the Sixteenth had recalled from exile.

The struggle then recommenced with more animation and more violence than ever, between the philosophers on the one side, and the priesthood on the other, seconded by the footmen of the court. All means were judged proper by shameless great lords, and the ecclesiastics, their worthy acolytes, to triumph over their opponents in this discussion; they first sought to excite troubles in the kingdom by monopolising the grain, and starving the people; they then applied themselves to perverting the soul of the young queen, surrounded her with seductions of all kinds, pushed her into an abyss of corruption, and made her the instrument of their hatred. The feeble Louis the Sixteenth, ruled by Marie Antoinette, obeyed the impulse of the clergy and nobility, and thought of nothing less than arresting the car of civilization. For a moment, one might have imagined that their sacrilegious wishes were realised; two ministers of integrity, Turgot and Malesherbes, the partizans of toleration, were forced to retire; letters de cachet were issued against several men of letters; every thing presaged a religious reaction. The apostolic nuncio even was so assured of the triumph of the ecclesiastics and of a return to the good traditions of ultra montanism, that he wrote to the holy father that France was still worthy of the name of the eldest daughter of the church, which the first popes had given it, and that before long the philosophers would be all crushed, burned, or shut up in the bastille.

This news was naturally received at Rome with transports of joy; it rejoiced the pontiff the more, since this mode of proceeding to conversions was entirely in accordance with his views, and as he himself was preparing to put in force, through the police of his states, the old decrees of his predecessors against heretics, and particularly against the Jews, which had fallen into disuse on account of their cruelty and absurdity. Instead of moderating them, he rendered them more rigorous than ever; he assigned to the Israelites an infected quarter, called the Ghetto, prohibited them, under penalty of death, from passing the night out of their prison, enjoined on them, under penalty of the galleys, not to approach the convent of the Annunciado, and not to be seen near the churches, monasteries, or hospitals of Rome. He prohibited them from carrying on any commerce with the Christians, or even from taking Catholic domestics into their service, unless they wished to incur very severe corporal punishments. And, that we may not be accused of extravagance, we will add, that most of these odious measures are still in full vigour at Rome, Naples, Turin, Milan, Modena, and all the cities of Italy, which are submitted to the despotism of reigning princes. Each city has its ghetto; no Jew has the right to possess, without it, the smallest parcel of land; only, for those who essayed to quit the ghetto, the penalty of death has been replaced by that of the galleys, a fine, or imprisonment.

Pius the Sixth also exacted that the Jews should only use yellow garments, and should celebrate no ceremony but the funeral of their coreligionists. So much rigour constrained a crowd of these unfortunate people to fly from the states of the church; it was what the pope desired, since the property of emigrants appertained by law to the Holy See. Those who continued to dwell at Rome, independently of the bad treatment they received, were subjected to enormous imposts.

All the money which the pontiff extracted from the Jews was swallowed up with that of the Christians in foolish expenses, which the pontiff thought would shed great lustre on his reign. Among other extravagancies, he increased beyond measure the museum of antiquities, which was commenced by his predecessor; he made large excavations in the environs of Otricoli, which produced no other discovery than some shafts of columns, some tripods, and the remains of mosaics; he added a sacristy to the church of St. Peter, into which he crowded, without order or taste, a crowd of master-pieces of sculpture and painting, which cost him enormous sums; he threw down and reconstructed, in gigantic proportions, the miserable abbey of Subiaco, of which he had been superior, whilst he occupied the post of treasurer to the apostolic chamber. The only labours which he executed for a really useful end, were the grading of the routes which led to Rome; he even proceeded in this work by vexatious means, which increased the public misery; he was infamous enough, after having made the community contribute to these expenses by extraordinary taxes, to have the work performed by compulsory and unpaid labour.

He lavished in turn millions on the embellishment of the Quirinal palace and in draining the Pontine marshes, an enterprise which was doubtless very glorious, had it not been undertaken from an interest of cupidity, and to augment the wealth of his bastard. These Pontine marshes had submerged, for very many ages, an immense extent of land, and spread through all the environs pestilential emanations, which, fortunately for the inhabitants of Rome, were arrested by the forests of Cisterna and Sermenetta.

The Pontine marshes commenced at the bridge of Astura, where Cicero had been beheaded, and where the unfortunate Conradin, thirteen centuries afterwards, fell into the hands of his cruel conqueror, the duke of Anjou, the brother of St. Louis; they extended along the shore as far as Terracina, on the confines of the kingdom of Naples, and in some places even penetrated into it. Historical traditions represent this plain to have been one of the most fertile in Italy. The authors of antiquity count as many as twenty-three cities or towns of the warlike nation of the Volsci, as inhabiting the place which the waters afterwards occupied.

Three hundred years before the Christian era, in consequence of the ravages of war, the Volscian cities had entirely disappeared, and their country had been transformed into a marsh, when the censor, Appius Claudius, surnamed the Blind, endeavoured to restore the country and built the way, which has preserved his name. A century and a half later, the consul, Cornelius Cethegus, resumed the labours which had been interrupted; he was in his turn compelled to suspend them. Julius Cæsar found this country abandoned to new devastations, and thought of undertaking great works to restore to it its former fertility. Augustus, the heir of his plans, dug an immense canal, destined to receive the stagnant waters and to drain them. Trajan was also engaged with the Pontine marshes; but their successors lost sight of this object; then when the emperors disappeared to give place to the popes, the labour of draining was completely abandoned, and this country, once so flourishing, was buried beneath the waves.

Some pontiffs, less indolent than most of the successors of the apostle, Boniface the Thirteenth, Martin the Fifth, Leo the Tenth, Sixtus the Fifth, attempted some reparations, abandoned almost as soon as begun. Finally, Pius the Sixth, in his advent to the throne of St. Peter, cast his eyes upon the Pontine marshes, and determined to reconquer from the seas the ancient country of the Volsci, and to form an appanage out of it for his bastard. He first established a bank, by the name of the Mont des Marais, to receive the funds devoted to this enterprise, and which amounted in a few months, by voluntary subscriptions, to the sum of a hundred and fifty thousand Roman crowns; he then caused plans to be drawn up by Bolognini and the skilful engineer Sani, to be enabled to sound the places which offered the most facilities for the work. They began by repairing an old aqueduct, which supplied the city of Terracina with water; they then cleared the famous Appian way, concealed for so many centuries beneath beds of mud, which was constructed entirely of blocks of lava, and still furrowed by the ruts which the Roman carriages, and perhaps the triumphal chariots of the old consuls of the republic, had made. Thousands of arms were employed in digging a large canal, which was to lead into Lake Fogliana, and dried several leagues of ground, which were immediately put under cultivation.

This first success encouraged the holy father to persevere in his enterprise, and even decided him to build an important city in the midst of the marshes, which a grand canal was to traverse in the lower part, emptying itself into the sea. The work had already been commenced, and enormous sums expended, when an engineer thought of measuring the levels, and found that the earth was much lower than the sea. Pius the Sixth was consequently obliged to renounce his plans; he then turned towards the side adjoining the declivities of the mountains, and swallowed up in new efforts, all the money in the apostolic treasury, that of voluntary taxes and forced imposts, and that which he drew from the treasury of our Lady of Loretto.

The most odious part of all this operation was, that the pope, to replace the voids which death made among the workmen, carried off forcibly labourers from the adjoining country, and decimated the population. He finally became so hated, that the Romans no longer designated him but by the name of "Secatore," in allusion to his mania for draining the marshes, and to the ingenious means he resorted to to drain their purses. Every one asked what great interest induced the pope to pursue this senseless strife against nature, when he might, at a quarter of the expense, and without danger to the lives of the workmen, have cleared up the uncultivated land in the states of the church, which were five times more considerable. The cause of this preference was very simple; the waste lands belonged to the cities or private individuals, and the holy father could not dispose of them at his good pleasure. The Pontine marshes, on the contrary, having no owners, his holiness had the free disposal of them, and could form an appanage out of them for some of his own.

In the prosperous ages of nepotism, the popes enriched their relatives with the pious presents which flowed from all parts of Europe into the purse of St. Peter; but since superstition had decreased among nations, they were obliged to do so at the expense of the Roman people, and to increase the imposts to gratify the avidity of their relatives. Pius the Sixth naturally followed this path for the two bastards whom his sister had borne him. He purchased for the youngest, who was called Romuald, the property of the duke of Lante, conferred on him the title of count, gave him magnificent equipages and apartments in the interior of the palace; then, to take all pretext for public malignity, which gave to his handsome nephew the names of Ganymede and minion, he sent him to the court of France with the rank of apostolic nuncio.

The pope behaved, in the absence of young Romuald, as if he had been his most cherished mistress; he occupied himself with causing a magnificent palace to be decorated by the first artists, painters, and sculptors; he adorned it with splendid furniture, rich hangings, and extremely precious objects, either as antiquities or works of art. He was even so interested in rendering this palace worthy of the object of his shameful amours, that he was taken very sick, and ran the risk of his life.

The nuncio, warned of the state in which his uncle was, returned immediately to Rome, under the pretence of consoling him, but in reality not to leave to others the care of pillaging the apostolic treasury. The convalescence of Pius the Sixth disappointed the hopes of his nephew in the pillage of the purse of the church, but it was only to render his fortune more brilliant. He was first created apostolic prothonotary, which gave him a right to wear a violet-coloured robe, and to be called Monsieur, he was then made major domo of the sovereign pontiff, and received several important benefices.

His holiness did not confine himself to these acts of kindness for his family. When he had assured the fortune of his cherished bastard, he thought of the establishment of his elder brother; he gave him also the title of count, with equipages, horses, and palaces; he permitted him then to draw upon the apostolic treasury, in order to make speculations of the most revolting cupidity, to monopolise grain, oil, and all provisions of the first necessity, of which he might raise the price, and then sell again to an outrageous profit.

Count Louis became, in his turn, the minion of the holy father, and partook of his infamous caresses with his own mother, his brother, and a young girl named Dona Costanza, of a ravishing beauty, the fruit of the adultery of Pius, when he was but a cardinal, with the countess Falconieri, and to whom he was united in marriage!!

The pope loaded his nephew with favours in commemoration of this event. Independently of the new title of duke de Braschi, which he had conferred on him some time before, he gave him a precious casket which contained ten thousand doubloons in gold, rosaries, diamonds of inestimable price, a collection of medals enriched with precious stones, lands, domains, palaces, a part of the great property which the Jesuits had possessed at Tivoli, and the magnificent silver plate of this brotherhood, which had been confiscated. The new couple received, besides, from the cardinals, Roman princes, the nobility, prelates, bishops, farmers of the apostolic chamber, and officers of every class, considerable presents, and in such great abundance, that they filled several halls in the Vatican.

It appeared by the vain-glorious joy which the sovereign pontiff manifested at the sight of these presents, as if he felt a sort of defiance to place all Christendom under contribution for his bastards. He was not content with the offerings of the Romans, he wished even to bring Catholic kings into the interest of the duke and dutchess de Braschi. He took advantage of the accouchments of the princess of the Asturias, and the queen of France, and sent, in the name of his beloved niece, blessed swaddling clothes, destined for the embryo who was one day to rule over Spain, and for the son of Louis the Sixteenth. His hopes were not deceived; the courts of Madrid and Versailles were foolish enough to recognise the gallantry of such a proceeding, and rained down on the well-beloved bastards of the holy father, gifts, pensions, gold, precious stones, and decorations of every kind.

All sovereigns, however, did not partake of the infatuation of Louis the Sixteenth and the prince of the Asturias. The emperor, Joseph the Second, was, on the contrary, outraged by the licentiousness of the pontifical family, and in his indignation announced his determination to break off all intercourse with the court of Rome, and to drive ultra montanism out of his kingdom. The sentiments which urged this monarch into the progressive path were not entirely disinterested, and his real end was to substitute his own absolute authority for the pontifical infallibility of the papacy. He commenced by permitting his subjects in Germany and Italy to speak and write as they pleased about religious matters; he prohibited the publication of bulls, briefs, decretals, or other acts emanating from the court of Rome, throughout his dominions; he submitted the monastic orders to the jurisdiction of the ordinaries, and prohibited them from all correspondence with foreign superiors; he suspended the reception of novices in the convents; he secularised a large number of religious and monks; declared the colleges of the missions, and the seminaries, freed from the immediate dependence on the Holy See; disposed of bishoprics, benefices, and abbeys; submitted the bishops to an oath of fidelity, restrained the franchises of holy places, and regulated the external discipline of the churches. He was then occupied with proceedings against the refractory; he deprived of his revenues the cardinal Miguzzi, the archbishop of Vienna, the avowed enemy of all reform; he drove from their sees, their cures, or their colleges, the bishops, priests, and Jesuits who had persecuted the abbot Ploner, the governor of the seminary of Brixen, in Moravia, under the pretence of Jansenism. He suppressed, and erased from the missals, the constitution "Unigenitus," and the bull "In Cœna Domini;" and, finally, he abolished the odious tribunals of the inquisition, and prohibited his subjects from going to Rome for dispensations.

These reforms excited to the utmost the anger of his holiness, and determined him to address representations to Joseph the Second, through Monsignor Garampi, his nuncio at Vienna. But the emperor was but little moved by them, and charged Prince Kaunitz, his minister, to inform the court of Rome that he must not be reprimanded as to his proceedings in his own provinces, inasmuch as he did not touch the doctrines of Catholicism, and that the angry notes of the pope would produce no other result than a rupture with the Holy See, and the appointment of a patriarch in Austria.

This threat was a thunderbolt to Pius the Sixth; it humbled his pride, and induced a determination which surprised all Europe. His holiness thought that no other means of bringing back Joseph were left, but to go to him personally, and without delay he addressed a brief to him to apprise him of his determination.

The sovereign pontiff, under the pretext of representing the apostolic see worthily, wished that his journey should resemble a triumphal march, and made a gorgeous display through the whole route. He left Rome by the gate del Popolo, and was accompanied by the principal lords of his court, as far as the city of Otricoli, where he separated from his dear nephews. The latter returned that same night to the holy city, to assist at an illumination of the church of St. Peter, and at artificial fireworks, which were to be discharged from the castle of San Angelo in their honour.

Pius the Sixth, who desired ardently to appear at the court of the emperor in all the lustre of his majesty, had been careful to carry with him his tiara, and the crosses of ceremony, as well as his most magnificent ornaments. He had also made a provision of caps to gain the bishops, and of gold medals to seduce the ecclesiastics. These medals were struck on one side with the likeness of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and on the other with his own, which made him say to the prelates, that it was not the foolish persons whom they represented, that rendered them precious, but the metal out of which they were made. His holiness was compelled to receive every where, in his passage, puerile honours, to distribute relics, rosaries, and scapularies, to have his sandals kissed, and to distribute indulgences.

The journey of Pius the Sixth was one long farce; at Tolentino he adored the bones of St. Nicholas; at our Lady of Loretto, he begged pardon of the Virgin for having made forced loans for the Pontine marshes; at Cesena, his native city, he showed himself at a grand dinner with all his relatives, and got extravagantly drunk; at Imola he treated the ambassadors of the king of Sardinia and the duke of Parma in the same way, and renewed the same outrage. Finally, he entered the Venetian states in the Bucentaur, which waited for him on his leaving Ferrara, and descended from it at the island of Chiozza, where he was complimented by the Venetian prelates, the doge, and the senate, whom the two procurators of St. Mark represented. He was unwilling, however, to visit the queen of the Adriatic, and leaving Venice on his right, he passed through the canals of the Lagunes and disembarked at Malagherra. From this city he went to Treviso, crossed the Po on a bridge built expressly for him, stopped for a moment at Udine, the last town of the republic, and entered the Austrian territories.

At Giritz he found the nuncio Garampi, the count Cobartzel, the vice chancellor of the emperor, a squadron of the noble guard, and several lords, who waited to escort him to Vienna. At Laybach, in Carniola, the arch-duchess Mary Ann, the sister of the emperor, came to meet him, and kissed his feet, to the great edification of the faithful. At Gratz, he walked for an hour between two rows of spectators, who, notwithstanding the guards, broke the order of the march, to kiss his sacred vestments. At Neunkirchen, he found the emperor and his brother, the arch-duke Maximilian, who awaited him in the midst of a brilliant escort of lords and ladies. The pontiff descended from his carriage as soon as he saw the two princes, and took some steps in advance to join Joseph the Second, who, on his side, had set foot on the earth. The emperor and the holy father embraced three times, and gave reciprocal testimonials of interest; it was even remarked, that tears of tenderness flowed from the eyes of these two eminent personages; it is true that Pius the Sixth knew how to weep at will, and Joseph the Second, on proper occasions. Thus they mounted into a carriage, and entered Vienna to the ringing of bells and the noise of cannon, escorted by an innumerable crowd of people who filled the streets, standing on tiers of staging, from the first stories to the roofs, and made the air resound with fanatical acclamations. Pius the Sixth, intoxicated with joy, exalted by vanity, did not cease to rise in his carriage, extend his arms and send floods of blessings among the stupid crowd.

It would be really difficult to give an idea of the sensation which this pontifical farce produced, if historians, who were witnesses of it, had not been careful to preserve a relation of it for us. A Lutheran thus expresses himself in a letter to one of his friends. "You cannot imagine what an effect the presence of the pope produced in our city, especially when he exhibited himself to the people. I have seen more than fifty thousand men together, salute the head of Catholicity with frenzied shouts, when he raised the tiara to his brow, clothed with ornaments sacred in their sight, magnificent in ours, surrounded by cardinals, bishops, and all the high clergy. The skilful actor bends towards the earth, then raises his arms to heaven in a theatrical attitude, and appears profoundly persuaded that he bears thither the vows of a whole nation. Figure to yourself this ceremony, performed by an old man of majestic stature, of the noblest and handsomest figure; figure to yourself this immense crowd, which falls on its knees with religious enthusiasm, at the moment in which the pontiff bestows his blessing upon it. Judge how forcibly these religious scenes must operate on weak minds which are disposed to be seduced by external actions."

They acted, in fact, on the Viennese to such a point, that for a month the course of the Danube was constantly obstructed by the crowd of barks which were mounting or descending the river, and which bore thousands of curious persons to the capital of the empire. The faithful pressed by twenty and thirty thousands into the streets which surrounded the imperial palace, where the pope resided, and five times a day was his holiness obliged to appear at his balcony to grant to this impatient multitude the easy benefit of his blessing.

The fanatical worship which the Austrians rendered to Pius the Sixth, was not confined to his person, but extended even to his garments and sandals. Every one knows the veneration of the Catholics for the male of the pope. It was the time, now or never, for superstitious farce; the sacred slipper was placed carefully on a cushion, in the audience chamber, and an incredible number of devotees and imbeciles of every class came to kiss it, to the disgrace of the human kind. They did more; it was carried about as a relic through the lordly mansions of Vienna, and princes made it a pious duty, to kiss the slipper of a sodomite and incestuous priest.

Joseph the Second finished it by taking charge of the enthusiasm of his people for Pius the Sixth, and thought to dismiss him; he wished, however, to have the appearance of granting him some concessions; he permitted his subjects to address themselves to Rome to obtain dispensations of the first and second degree; he consented that nothing should be changed in the appointment to the vacant sees of Lombardy; he tolerated historical instruction, in regard to the questions which related to the bull "Unigenitus," and only prohibited discussions concerning the dogmas it taught or those it condemned.

Before separating, the emperor and pontiff gave to each other mutual marks of affection. Joseph presented the head of the church with a breast-plate enriched with diamonds, and valued at more than two hundred thousand florins; he gave him besides, through the vice chancellor of the empire, a diploma, which elevated his bastard, Louis Braschi Onesti, to the dignity of a prince of the holy empire, and exempted him from the taxes paid in such cases, which amounted to ninety thousand florins; he did not forget the cardinals and bishops who composed the suite of the pontiff, he ennobled them all and made them rich presents. On the day of his departure, he accompanied him as far as the church of Mariabrunn, a league from Vienna, and embraced him with appearances of the frankest cordiality. But that was all, for scarcely had the pope left the Austrian territories, than the emperor resumed his plans of reform, annulled the preceding decrees in regard to the sees of Lombardy, himself appointed a prelate to the archbishopric of Milan, suppressed the mendicant orders which infested his kingdom, seized the revenues, restrained the privileges of the apostolic nuncios, sanctioned his edicts of toleration, and took under his immediate protection, writers who were hostile to the court of Rome.

Joseph the Second having entered further than ever on the path of religious reforms, was desirous of overthrowing at a blow the obstacles which opposed his designs, and went into Italy for the purpose of making a last effort to bring the Holy See to extreme concessions, or openly to declare his rupture with the papal court. He was received at Rome as Pius the Sixth had been at Vienna, but instead of falling out abruptly as he had intended to do, he allowed himself to be overreached by the cardinal de Bernis, the ambassador of France, and the chevalier Azara, the Spanish minister, and consented to conclude a kind of concordat with the Holy See.

Pius the Sixth no longer disturbed himself about the reforms in Germany, and surrendered himself to all the excesses of drunken debauchery. The Vatican was the nightly theatre of disgusting saturnalia, at which met the father, the daughter, and the two brothers; and which recalled the orgies of the Borgias. Rome was daily informed by the indiscretions of the officers of the palace, who were the favourites of the pope during the night, and whether he had chosen among his bastards, his pages, or the scullions in his kitchen.

His holiness no longer performed any pontifical functions; he passed whole mornings at his toilette, painted his cheeks and his lips, perfumed his hands and his breast; he bathed himself with precious essences, like the most coquettish of courtezans, and decorated himself with lace. Gorani maintains that he fell into a violent passion when his chamberlains did not dress him to his fancy, and that he beat them with his fist, and that one day he beat a tailor almost to death for bringing him a badly fitting garment. It is certain that Pius the Sixth was extremely arrogant and rough, and that he preserved this violent character to his death. Finally, his turpitudes rendered him such an object of hatred and contempt to the Romans, that in the religious ceremonies in which he appeared, the faithful returned him only hisses in exchange for his blessings.

It may not be useless to give information concerning a very curious incident which caused great noise throughout all Italy. A certain Amanzio Lepri, a Milanese by birth, and the son of an old officer of the customs, was the possessor of a considerable fortune, which he expended in pious works. The pope having been informed that this blessed person was of an extremely weak mind, determined to use religion for the purpose of seizing on his great wealth. He sent an old Jesuit to him, who inspired doubts in his mind as to the lawfulness of his wealth, determined him to embrace the ecclesiastical state, and to make a donation of his large patrimony to the bastard and cherished daughter of his holiness.

Pius affected to wish that the duke de Braschi should not accept the gift; he then permitted himself to be overcome by the entreaties of Amanzio Lepri, and only insisted, as a condition, that he should reserve for himself a pension of five hundred crowns a month. The sister-in-law of this fanatic, the marchioness Victoire Lepri, protested against these dispositions, which deprived her young daughter Marianne, the niece and pupil of Amanzio, of her inheritance, and attacked the donation before the tribunal of the auditor of the chamber. The latter, who was all devotion to the pope, rejected her petition, and received the hat of a cardinal as the price of his conduct. Victoire Lepri was not discouraged, and she appealed to the tribunal of the rota. This was the only jurisdiction which had preserved any independence at Rome, and consequently its right to public regard; it owed its independence to its organization, being composed of twelve judges or auditors, of whom three only were Romans, and the rest spread about in the following manner; one from Bologna, one from Ferrara, one from Venice, one from Milan, one German, two Spaniards, and two Frenchmen. Five of these doctors only were paid by the pope, the others were paid by the states to which they belonged. The form of their judgment was simple, and left little room for chicanery; every thing concurred to render them respectable.

Pius the Sixth, fearing a condemnation, offered the marchioness to pay her down a hundred thousand crowns, provided she would desist from her pursuits, and even proposed to marry the young Marianne to his nephew Romuald Onesti. The family of Lepri refused, and persisted in its determination to have the donation voided by the tribunal of the rota. The judges rendered a decree favourable to the dispossessed pupil, and broke the act of donation. The holy father was not conquered, he extorted a will in proper form from the imbecile Amanzio in favour of his nephew, the duke de Braschi, and then when he had this important piece, he merely poisoned him to prevent him from taking a fancy to change his mind. On the next day he convened the tribunal of the rota and presented the will, in order that his bastard should be put in possession of the property of the deceased; but what were his astonishment and rage, when at the very moment when the judges were about to pronounce in favour of the validity of the rights of the duke de Braschi, to see the young Marianne herself, led by her mother, advance before the tribunal and unroll a later will than that of the pope, in which Amanzio declared that he appointed her his sole heiress, that he annulled the donation made in favour of the nephew of the pontiff, as well as the will which had been obtained from him by violence, and that he left to his family the task of avenging his death.

This incident changed every thing; the tribunal pronounced a second judgment in favour of Marianne Lepri, and cast the duke de Braschi. The obstinate pontiff did not yet abandon it; he refused to yield to the orders of the magistrates, and decided, of his own authority, that the cause should be re-examined, and in the interval he brought into play threats and promises so appropriately, that the auditors handed to him on a plate of gold, the definite decree, which confirmed the donation of the unfortunate Amanzio to the infamous Duke de Braschi, and which condemned his lawful heirs to pay the expenses of the proceedings. This odious spoliation excited a general indignation among the Romans, and even among foreigners; the courts of Naples, Spain, France, Germany, the republic of Venice, the states of Modena, and the dutchy of Parma lashed the conduct of the pope in their gazettes.

Joseph the Second took advantage of it to keep no longer on any terms with the Holy See; he abolished the nunciatures entirely, as contrary to the jurisdiction of the ordinary bishops; he made a decree concerning the nuncios, and brought them down to the class of mere diplomatic envoys; he then assembled the famous congress of Ems. The prelates who composed this meeting framed twenty-three very important articles, which were directly hostile to the ultra montane principles of the court of Rome, and which, among other things, proclaimed the independence of the religious of every superior residing in a foreign country, the absolute authority of bishops in their dioceses from all exemptions and dispensations, the necessity of the acceptance of the Roman bulls by competent authority to render them binding in the empire, the abolition of the oath of vassalage prescribed to prelates by Gregory the Seventh, the exclusive recognition as the true public law of the German church, of the decrees of the council of Basle, and the abolition of the concordat concluded with Rome at Aschaffenburg. Finally, in order to give the last blow to the supremacy of the Holy See, Joseph demanded from the pope, through the congress, the convocation of an œcumenical council, which the popes had promised for two centuries; he rested this demand on the necessity which existed in the church to abolish a crowd of superstitious usages which compromised religion, and at the same time to revise the lying constitutions which served as a pretext for the encroachments of the court of Rome.

The troubles which then broke out in the low countries, distracted the attention of the emperor, and compelled him to defer the execution of his plans to another time; his example had, however, produced good results; the taste for reform had reached the states of Italy; the republics of Venice and Genoa, the kingdom of Naples, and the dutchy of Modena, laboured seriously to abase the Holy See; the grand duke of Tuscany, Leopold, the brother of Joseph the Second, especially distinguished himself in this crusade against the papacy; like the emperor, he had convened a council at Pistoia, under the presidency of the bishop of that city, the famous Scipio Ricci, the nephew of the general of the Jesuits who had died in the dungeons of the castle of San Angelo, a prelate of sincere piety, but who had the misfortune, in the eyes of the pontiff, of not sharing the sentiments of the disciples of Ignatius Loyola. His holiness immediately condemned the decisions to which this assembly came, and prohibited the duke of Tuscany from paying any attention to them. Leopold, instead of being intimidated by the apostolic censures, assembled the bishops of his kingdom at Florence, to have four new articles adopted concerning the reformation of the breviaries and missals, the translation of the ritual into the vulgar tongue, the precedence of curates over canons, and the declaration that the episcopal institution was of divine right. But Pius the Sixth had intrigued so well, and put into play so well the resources of corruption, that a majority of the prelates declared against the plans of the grand duke.

The coteries of the pope did not confine itself to this first success, it wished to render its victory complete by crushing at once the prince and Scipio Ricci; it sent agitators into the city of Pistoia, excited the fanatics of the place by accusing the bishop of wishing to destroy religion, and by giving as proofs, that five years before, he had carried off a miraculous relic from the church of Prato. The intrepid Ricci made head against the storm, and pursued, none the less, the execution of his generous plans of reform; he gave his attention particularly to the religious houses, whose disorders gave rise to great scandal, and proved that in the convents of the Dominicans licentiousness had reached its utmost extreme.

From the declarations of the nuns, it was shown that in the convents of St. Lucia and St. Catherine at Pistoia, the female Dominicans received their confessors in the chapter, and abandoned themselves to the most unbridled excesses of libertinage on the very steps of the altar; other nuns avowed that frequently jealousy, or the inconstancy of the monks, led to serious collisions; that they disputed for the provincial or prior; that they deprived themselves of their money or effects for their confessors; that several Dominicans had five or six mistresses at once, who formed a kind of seraglio; that at each promotion of a provincial in the monastery of the men, the newly chosen went to the convent to choose a favourite, and that the novices, entirely naked, were ranged in two rows for his inspection, that he placed his hat on the head of her who pleased him most, and made her his mistress at once. Scipio Ricci further discovered that these disorders were not the only ones to which the nuns abandoned themselves; he ascertained that they surrendered themselves to the most horrid saturnalia among themselves, and that they professed the most libertine quietism. He put an end to these turpitudes by placing these houses of prostitution under an inflexible supervision, and by excluding the Dominicans from employment as confessors.

It was in vain that the holy father interfered and fulminated bulls against the reformer; the grand duke Leopold maintained the regulations of Scipio Ricci, and suppressed the inquisition throughout his dominions.

Ferdinand the Fourth, the king of the Two Sicilies, had also abolished the terrible tribunals of the holy office, and was preparing to enter on the path of monastic reform. He had already ordered the suppression of seventy-eight convents in Sicily; he went further, he ordered the other monasteries to make no new acquisitions in future, and he placed them all under the rule of the bishops; he then prohibited the ecclesiastics from obeying the regulations of the Roman chancellery, claimed from the sovereign pontiff the right of conferring the vacant benefices, and refused to continue to pay the disgraceful tribute which his predecessors had been accustomed to send to Rome, and which was called the homage of the hackney. Pius the Sixth protested against these efforts at rebellion on the part of the sovereign, threatened him with his anathemas, and informed him through his nuncio, that he would not permit a petty king to treat him like a country curate. His Sicilian majesty as his reply, drove the legate out of his kingdom and made preparations to chastise the insolent pontiff and retake the duchies of Castro and Ronciglione, which were enclosed in the states of the church and of which the kings of Naples had constantly claimed possession. The grave events which were occurring in France suspended the effects of the wrath of Ferdinand, and forced him to give all his attention to the imposing sight of a nation striving against royalty.

Louis the Sixteenth, yielding to the fatal councils of his courtiers, had committed the enormous fault of recalling all the ecclesiastics who had been banished on account of their fanaticism, of joining the party of the Jesuits, of declaring himself the enemy of the philosophers, and of persecuting to extremes the men who were the glory of the country. From that moment, the quarrels which had been for a time assuaged, resumed all their energy, and the monarchy found itself again exposed to the attacks of its formidable foes. It was no longer a faction that absolutism had to combat; it was a whole nation which rose in a menacing attitude to reclaim its forgotten rights, and which was preparing to demand a terrible account from royalty for the disasters it had, for fourteen centuries, drawn upon it.

Voltaire died at Paris, and the clergy, instigated by the Jesuits, had refused a tomb to the mortal remains of one of the greatest men of genius who has appeared in the world. Rousseau, the rival of the fame of Voltaire, had followed him to eternity, and the priests, renewing the same bigotry, had refused a corner of earth to the immortal author of the Social Contract.

The death of these two great men filled the nobles and ecclesiastics with joy; they all supposed that the party, deprived of its chiefs, could be easily crushed, and set to work to do it. The bishop addressed parliament to ask that an old decree, inflicting the penalty of death against the authors, printers, and distributors of books hostile to religion, should receive a rigorous execution. "We must punish with the sword of the executioner," said the prelates, "the crimes of the press. The philosophers who write against the church, are more culpable than regicides, for they attack God and not man. We claim the same punishment for them, and we also desire that their right hands be burned off! . . ." Louis the Sixteenth, to his shame, associated himself with this odious persecution against the writers. He threatened the republic of Geneva with his wrath, if it continued to allow irreligious books to be printed. At Paris, and in the provinces, he persecuted the booksellers and printers, in default of the authors, who escaped punishment by flight.

But nothing could arrest the spread of the philosophic doctrines; the phalanx, instead of diminishing, became daily more numerous, and more enterprising. Beaumarchais, Diderot, D'Alembert, Condorcet, Bailly, Thomas, Vieg-d'Azir, Marmontel, Chamfort, and a multitude of others, continued the work commenced by Voltaire. Magistrates, members of the university, lords of the court, ministers, showed themselves to be partizans of the new ideas. It was the fashion in high society to condemn the institutions of a decrepid papacy and of a tottering monarchy.

The agitation which was manifested in France, caused serious alarms to Pius the Sixth, and foreshadowed to him that the time was not far distant when the eldest daughter of the church would free itself from the tutelage of its mother. The court did not, however, cease to maintain the best relations with his holiness, and the imbecile Louis the Sixteenth offered large sums to the Roman chancery to canonise the blessed daughter of Louis the Eleventh, Joan the Lamb, whom Louis the Twelfth had so scandalously repudiated for the haughty Anne of Brittany, his second wife. But before this ridiculous matter was settled, the good understanding was interrupted by the famous proceedings about the necklace, in which the honour of the queen of France and of a prince of the church were seriously compromised. The arrest of the principal culprit, the cardinal de Rohan, had created a great sensation in the sacred college. The pope had immediately addressed representations to the ambassador of France, and had signified to him that he would invoke the observance of the canonical rules in favour of the accused, if matters were carried further.

Louis the Sixteenth would listen to nothing, and declared that he would proceed to the judgment of the prince de Rohan notwithstanding the pope, the cardinals, and all foreign courts, in order to avenge the honour of the queen. Monseigneur de Rohan then determined to face the danger, and demanded to have his cause submitted to the parliament for examination. The wary prelate had foreseen that Marie Antoinette would recoil before the scandal of public debates, would purchase his silence, and have him cleared. But the sacred college, which did not know the motives which had induced him to take this determination, did not like the step, and protested against his voluntary abandonment of his rights, by declaring that the court of Rome could alone judge a prince of the church.

All Europe was engaged about this trial. The king of Spain sent notes to France, to engage Louis the Sixteenth to hush up this matter; the emperor of Germany claimed the cardinal de Rohan for the same purpose, as a prince of the holy Roman Empire. The elector of Mayence also maintained, that he had a right to take cognizance of this accusation, because the accused was bishop of Strasburg and his suffragan; finally, the diet of Ratisbon claimed jurisdiction of this cause as belonging to a state of the empire.

In this occurrence Pius the Sixth, discovering the impossibility of changing the dispositions of Louis the Sixteenth, who, though a little tardily, appeared to be serious about his honour as a husband, wished at least to save the dignity of the cardinals, and to shun the disgrace of having a prince of the church declared, by a secular tribunal, to be a slanderer, sharper, thief, and forger, he pronounced the suspension, ad interim, of the cardinal de Rohan, grand almoner of France, and granted him a respite of six months to justify himself before his peers, from the accusations brought against him.

The parliament of Paris maintained, that the brief of his holiness trespassed on the liberties of the Gallican church, refused to pay any attention, and continued its inquiries. Fortunately for the grand almoner, Marie Antoinette interfered secretly in the affair, gained over the most influential counsellors, and had him discharged. His eminence was immediately reinstalled in his titles and dignities, which made the Parisians say, in allusion to the pretended bon mot of Francis the First, that the cardinal had lost nothing but his honour.

Concord was restored between the two courts, their intercourse was replaced on the same footing as before this affair, and Louis the Sixteenth leaned, as before, on Pius the Sixth, to cause civilization to retrograde, and to restore France to ages of slavery. It was, however, no longer in the power of a king to accomplish this sacrilegious work; men and things, laws and constitutions, were all impelled, by an irresistible force, into the revolutionary whirlpool; and, as if events were not hurrying on fast enough even for the wishes of those whom they were to abase, nobles and priests affected more arrogance, more pride, than ever. The queen threw herself, with a kind of delirium, into pleasure and debauchery, without being restrained by the care of her own preservation—sacrificing the millions of France to the young lords and ladies of her court, who were the objects of her criminal ardour, at the time in which the finances of the nation were in a state of frightful disorder.

It was then that Louis the Sixteenth conceived the idea of convening the notables to obtain new imposts to meet the deficiencies of the treasury. From the very opening of the assembly it could be seen what progress ideas of reform had, thanks to the philosophers, made in all minds. The notables, though belonging to the privileged classes, refused the subsidies which were demanded of them, protested against the dissipation of the court, and demanded the suppression of the annates, a right which sent millions out of the kingdom yearly, for the benefit of the apostolic chamber.

Under these circumstances the nuncio of Pius the Sixth interfered to defend the interests of the court of Rome, and induced Louis the Sixteenth to place the reins of government in the hands of an energetic priest, who might, after the example of Richelieu, save the throne and the altar from imminent ruin. The feeble monarch obeyed, appointed as his principal minister Charles Lomenie de Brienne, archbishop of Toulouse, and gave to him the administration of the finances. The prelate immediately drew up edicts of imposts, and carried them to parliament to be registered. The counsellors refused to obey his orders, and declared that an assembly of the states-general was alone competent to establish public charges. That word, "states-general," immediately resounded through all France. The clergy, the nobility, the parliament, the burghers, all moved by different hopes or fears, proclaimed the principle, "that a nation represented by its delegates, possessed an imprescriptible right to reform abuses and levy imposts."

His majesty wished to resist the opinion and held several beds of justice, in which new edicts were registered; the parliament protested against this illegality, and declared the registry void. In vain had the principal minister resorted to intimidation, and caused the most refractory magistrates to be imprisoned. These acts of rigour only exasperated men the more, and compelled the king to dismiss his minister, and give him as a successor the Genevese Necker, and to issue a decree fixing the opening of the states-general for the 1st of May, 1789. An incredible effervescence was already manifested in all parts of France; clubs and political assemblies organised everywhere, for the elections of the commissioners of the nation.

At last, on the 4th of May, 1789, the deputies of three orders, the third estates, the nobility, and the clergy went to Versailles, where they were to hold their meetings. Louis the Sixteenth, followed by the princes and great officers of the crown, went to meet them at the church of the Holy Spirit, to hear a solemn mass, at the conclusion of which, Monseigneur de la Fare, bishop of Nancy, preached a sermon, in which he mixed up protestations of love for religion, loyalty to the king, and sublime reflections on the advantages of liberty. On the following day, his majesty opened the states-general in a cautious speech, in which he was prodigal of assurances of his respect for the laws and love for the people. The deputies of the third estate were not the dupes of this hypocritical language; met to bring about useful reforms for the nation, they went to work, without allowing themselves to be deterred or discouraged by the obstacles of every kind which were thrown in their way. They began by attacking the ecclesiastical privileges, declared that the property of the clergy was national property, abolished the tithes, sold the properties of the churches and converted them into life rents; they then suppressed the annates. At length, on the 17th of May, the deputies, whose powers had been recognised, having taken the title of National Assembly, decreed the famous civil constitution of the clergy, which overthrew all degrees in the spiritual hierarchy, and enjoined on the bishops and curates to take the oath of fidelity to the nation.

The great majority of the French clergy refused to submit to the decisions of the assembly; out of one hundred and thirty bishops, only four were in favour of its adoption. The first consecration of constitutional bishops, soon, however, took place in the church of the Oratoire; Talleyrand Perigord, bishop of Autun, assisted by the prelates Gobel, Lydda, and Miroudot, conferred the constitutional episcopal dignity on the curates Expilly and Marolles, recently promoted to the sees of Quimper and Laon. This news created a profound sensation at the court of Rome; Pius the Sixth had contented himself, until that time, with addressing protests to the philosophic legislators, who, as he said, were biting each other, in the constituent assembly. He thought that his remonstrances had been too mild, and he determined, in order to intimidate the deputies, to launch terrible bulls against the ecclesiastics, who had taken the oath of fidelity to the constitution, and ordered them to retract within forty days, under penalty of being excommunicated as intruders, unlawful schismatics, heretics, and sacrilegious.

The bulls of his holiness only served to induce the legislative body to decree, that all intercourse should be broken off with the court of Rome, that the nuncio should be expelled from France, the ambassador recalled to Paris, and the priests who refused to take the oath be prosecuted as refractory.

Pius the Sixth found himself attacked at once in his spiritual and temporal power. The cry of liberty, uttered by the national assembly, had resounded at Avignon; the inhabitants of the Venaissin countship had rallied to the ideas of independence proclaimed by the French; they formed a national guard, framed a religious constitution on the same basis as that of the French, and had revolted against the vice legate, who commanded the province in the name of the pope. Then, on the refusal of his holiness to give his sanction to all these acts, they had driven from their territory the vice legates, the archbishop, and all the ecclesiastics attached to the court of Rome; finally, they had declared themselves independent of the pope, and had offered themselves to France. Pius the Sixth, furious at seeing one of his handsomest provinces detach itself from his temporal power, wished to make an effort to retain it beneath his sway; he organised bands of assassins, who, under the name of pontifical soldiers, abandoned themselves to frightful brigandages in the Venaissin territory, and murdered a great number of the republicans in the name of the holy father, and for the greater glory of religion. Most happily the cause of liberty triumphed; public indignation did justice to the murderers, and the country was reunited to France.

This event was celebrated in Paris by rejoicings, at the close of which the people of the capital burned the pope in effigy in the gardens of the Palais Royal; a burlesque farce which became, on the part of Pius the Sixth, a pretext for cruel reprisals. His holiness fell on the French who inhabited his states, and were regarded as partizans of the new ideas; he massacred or poisoned them all, and did the same towards the Italians and strangers, who were suspected of partaking of the doctrines of the constituent assembly; as for those who were regarded as indifferent, he contented himself with confining them in the dungeons of the castle of San Angelo, and submitting them to the harshest treatment.

Among these last was the famous Cagliostro, one of the most extraordinary men of the eighteenth century, who had retired to Rome after the affair of the queen's necklace, in which he was seriously compromised. After that affair he had married the beautiful Lorenzia Feliciani, who, under the name of Seraphina, had accompanied him in all his journeys, and shared his good and bad fortune. As he treated her with much harshness, after she was bound to him by indissoluble ties, the lady found no other way of getting rid of his tyranny than by revealing to her confessor, that he might impart it to other members of the sacred office, the divining practices by means of which Cagliostro duped fools.

The good father, much smitten with his beautiful penitent, had no scruples about destroying her husband, to obtain possession of her, and denounced Cagliostro to the tribunal of the inquisition. In consequence of this information, the latter was arrested and plunged into a dungeon; his trial then commenced. The inquiry was long and minute, considering the importance of the personage; all his letters and smallest papers were read, commented upon, and translated with extreme care; but nothing was discovered which treated of sorcery; they only judged from certain passages written by himself, that he was a Freemason and a partizan of the French ideas. He could not be judged worthy of the most cruel punishments. For a short time his holiness thought of having him burned alive, under the pretext of the crime of sorcery; then reflecting that such an execution would excite general indignation, he only condemned him to perpetual imprisonment. Another unfortunate, named Octavius Capelli, for the same crime, that is to say, for having expressed opinions favourable to the French republicans, was condemned to languish in a dungeon all his life; a monk, named Rugusain, underwent a still more cruel punishment on like accusations.

But what could the furious anger of a pope do before the revolutionary movement? The cry of liberty uttered in Paris, crossed the Alps, resounded even in Rome, and was repeated by the Italians. The holy father then conceived the thought of fomenting a civil war in France, and of using the legions of monks, who were devoted to his cause, in renewing the terrible religious wars. More than seventy thousand ecclesiastics had refused to take the constitutional oath; the constituent assembly had, however, the weakness to authorise them to celebrate divine service in the churches of the sworn priests. These miserable satellites of fanaticism, at the instigation of the court of Rome, unworthily abused this tolerance, to conspire against the new order of things; they insinuated to the devotees, that all the sacraments administered by the constitutional bishops and curates were essentially void; they rebaptised children, remarried adults, and dared to announce from the pulpit, that out of their communion were only concubinage, illegitimacy, and damnation. A dangerous agitation, the consequence of those insinuations, manifested itself in all the departments and reacted against the revolutionary work; fortunately the legislative assembly, which had succeeded the constituent, took measures to arrest the progress of the evil. It suppressed the pensions the state still allowed to the refractory, decreed the liberty of worship, the emancipation of all the monastic orders, the marriage of the priests, and on the proposition of Archbishop Torne, it prohibited all religious costumes.

Louis the Sixteenth wished to cover the clergy by his tottering authority, and used the right which the constitution granted to him of rejecting a law according to the caprice of his will, by a simple veto. The ecclesiastics resumed a pride and insolence which became fatal to them; they dared to announce publicly, that a vast confederacy had been organised by the pope, and that soon all the Catholic powers, reunited by his holiness, would fall together on France to stifle the philosophical hydra in a sea of blood.

The boldness of the clergy, and the imminence of the danger, at last impelled the legislative assembly to act with severity against the rebellious priests. It was enjoined on all ecclesiastics, without exception, to take the civic oath, or leave the kingdom. Those who refused to obey the decree, and persisted in remaining in France, were cast into the national prisons; the greater part, however, joined the princes and princesses who had fled to foreign lands, and who intrigued with kings to excite them against the nation.

Among the emigrants was the celebrated abbe Maury, one of the most skillful champions of despotism, who had taken refuge with the pope, and obtained flattering distinctions, and the title of nuncio, to represent the Holy See at the diet of Frankfort, in order to urge Germany into a war of invasion.

At last, thanks to the efforts of these props of tyranny, a formidable coalition was organised against France; the civil war broke out in la Vendée, and the frontiers were threatened by the armies of the kings of Prussia, Sweden, Austria, and Sardinia; within, base machinations increased the disorders, and threatened the country with certain ruin. Should we then be astonished that the people, in a moment of despair, at seeing all these disorders fall upon the country, dreading to fall beneath the yoke of despotism, went to the prisons which contained the enemies of liberty, to take vengeance on the guilty authors of these evils! Doubtless such outbreaks are to be deplored, but we will say that they were in some sort justified by the priests themselves, who, within their prisons, conspired against the nation, and did not cease to affront the anger of the people, by expressing the sacrilegious hope of seeing themselves delivered by the allied armies. And lest despotism should make too much noise about the massacres of the prisons, we will recall the crusades against the Albigenses executed under Philip the Second, the atrocities of the Armagnacs and Burgundians under King Charles the Sixth, the bloody executions of the St. Bartholomew under Charles the Ninth, the dragoonings of the Cévennes under Louis the Fourteenth, and will ask which, whether royalty or democracy, is in arrears to the other.

But events were changing appearances; a new national assembly, the convention, succeeds the legislative; the republic is proclaimed in France, and Louis the Sixteenth expiates the crimes of his race upon the scaffold. Pius the Sixth immediately fulminates a bull of excommunication against the French nation, designates it by the names of impious, sacrilegious, and abominable, and calls down upon it the thunders of heaven and earth. The convention sends the following letter to his holiness as its reply: "The Executive Council of the Republic to the prince bishop of Rome. Pontiff—You will immediately discharge from your dungeons several French citizens who are detained in them. If these demands are ineffectual, you will learn that the republic is too bold to overlook an outrage, and too powerful to allow it to go unpunished."

The pope could scarcely restrain his rage when he received the message of the convention. The cardinals, however, who surrounded him, having shown him the danger he incurred by exposing himself to the wrath of a republican people, there was seen the pretended vicar of God, the successor of St. Peter, the infallible pontiff, who lords it over the Christian world, humble himself before a simple deputy, sprung from the lowest ranks of the people, and promise to obey the wishes of the republic.

Then, on the news that the French had experienced some reverses, he resumed his boldness, assembled troops, and announced that he was about to put on the helm and cuirass to combat the republicans. After the example of their head, the priests and monks, filled with a holy enthusiasm, traversed the city and country, reunited fanatics on their way, enrolled them beneath the pontifical banners, and organised them into bands of assassins; then, when they supposed they were strong enough to fight the republic, they threw aside all shame, and in contempt of the laws of nations, massacred a secretary of the embassy, named Basseville, whilst passing through the streets to go to the academy, accompanied by his wife and children. These cannibals then rushed into the city exclaiming, "Long live Pius the Sixth! Long life to the St. Bartholomew! Death to all Frenchmen!"

The palace of the academy was invaded, the boarders pursued, and forced to fly before the swords of the priests, whilst other bands of murderers beat down the doors of the houses inhabited by the French, and there renewed the same scenes of violence.

In France, things were daily assuming a more inglorious aspect; within were disorders and anarchy; the peasants of Brittany and la Vendée, excited by the preaching of fanatics, organised the insurrection of the Chouans, and transformed their rich plains into frightful battle fields; without, despots and their hordes of slaves were warring, ready to fall on the republic. Such was the critical position into which nobles and priests had brought the country.

Pius the Sixth, the organizer of this sacrilegious crusade, undertaken by kings against liberty, was not backward in the odious task he had imposed upon himself. He, the head of the Catholic church, united with heretical England, and the schismatic northern courts, and formed, in connection with these powers, and the kings of Italy and Spain, a formidable coalition.

It is true that tyrants have neither religion nor country; their religion is an immoderate love of power; it is the exercise of that supreme power with which the weakness or the ignorance of their fellow citizens has invested them; their country is the throne on which they sit in the plenitude of their insolence. In the opinion of these demi-gods men are but slaves, only fit to dig into the bowels of the earth, to extract from it the wealth it contains, and they scarcely think them worthy to rear their palaces, and furnish their handsomest sons, and most beautiful daughters, to gratify their passions and licentiousness.

Grand and sublime in its efforts, the republic set on foot fourteen armies, struggled against its enemies, caused despots to tremble on their thrones, and announced that it was about to punish the old pope for his crimes and perfidies. At the news that the French were preparing to invade Italy, Pius the Sixth wished to make an appeal to fanaticism, and spread this furious proclamation through the provinces.

"Italians, as soon as the stroke of the bell shall announce the entrance of the republicans on the territories of the church, run all to arms, burn the harvests, poison the rivers and fountains; slay by every means, sword, fire, or poison, an unbridled foe, who mows off the heads of kings and priests with the axe of the executioner; annihilate these barbarous republicans, who have sworn to overthrow the throne and the altar. Obey, all of you, it is your god, your pope who orders you.

"We promise plenary indulgences and eternal recompenses to the faithful who shall murder most of these ferocious French; we grant an entire amnesty to robbers, assassins, and parricides, who shall redeem their crimes by fighting for religion; we give, in advance, our abolition to courageous women, who, like Judith, shall abandon themselves to the Philistines, and cut off their heads.

"Let all men who have received baptism hasten beneath the immaculate standard of the Roman church; let all Italy rise with its millions of swords at the voice of the vicar of Christ, and let all men and women plunge their hands in the blood of the French, and taste the delights of this glorious holocaust.

"We grant no dispensation from this crusade but to ecclesiastics; because it is the duty of pastors to elevate their arms upon the mountains, whilst the faithful are combatting and murdering each other in the plain."

Never had fanaticism spoken a more furious language during the days of darkness of the middle ages, nor during the fury of the league. Fortunately the times were changed, and the proclamation of the holy father had scarcely any influence over the people of the ecclesiastical states. Besides, what could men demoralised by misery, rendered brutal by exactions, and plunged in the most profound ignorance, do? Moreover, the apostolic treasury was empty; its credit gone, and the resource of loans exhausted. Every thing had been swallowed up by the pontiff or his bastards, even to the plate of the churches. The Italians made no movement, and awaited the arrival of the French, not as enemies, but as liberators. Nay, more; the pope having desired to double the taxes, they revolted against the fiscal agents, killed some of them at Rome, and even thought of burning the palace of the duke de Braschi, whose wealth and insolent luxury contrasted in so odious a manner with the general distress. But a few sbirri were enough to arrest the hostile manifestations, and cause the degenerate sons of ancient Rome to tremble. It is related, that the miserable people were so demoralised that on the day of an outbreak, Braschi left his palace with a whip in his hand, followed by some lackeys carrying baskets filled with pieces of money, and cried out in a loud voice, "Here, throw some gold to this mob, that it may go howl farther off." Then, clearing a passage with blows of his whip, he passed through the crowd, without a single man daring to punish his insolence. As the holy father lost some of his guards in these collisions, he determined to declare them inviolable, and published, that every insult offered to one of the sbirri would be regarded as a crime of high treason.

In the interval, France had seen the convention pass away, and the Thermidorean reaction be accomplished. A party, composed of all the infamous men who had enriched themselves by betraying the popular cause, triumphed over the mountain, and placed the exercise of power in the hands of a council of five members, called the directory. With these men reappeared the priests, and in their train came bands of assassins, organised under the name of the company of Jesus, who made a terrible war on the republic.

These new soldiers of the cross, recruited from among the nobles and the unfrocked monks, spread through several departments, especially those of Vaucluse and the mouths of the Rhone, and exercised the most barbarous atrocities in the name of the pope, and of Louis the Eighteenth, the king of France, whom his holiness, Pius the Sixth, had recognised by that title, since the news of the death of the son of Louis the Sixteenth in the temple.

Their audacity soon increasing, from the feebleness of the directory, they dared to proclaim Catholicism the national religion. Five bishops sworn to, and secretly affiliated with the Jesuits, seconded their plans by publishing an encyclical letter, to which thirty-three other prelates adhered, that is to say, almost the whole new Gallican church. The refractory priests thought that their day of triumph had come, and encouraged the companies of Jesus in their work of devastation. The court of Rome applauded this sanguinary zeal, and in the intoxication of its joy commanded actions of solemn thanks for the success of the cause of despotism.

The directory was at last aroused by the progress of the companies of Jesus, and took vigorous measures to arrest them. They exacted the civic oath from all ecclesiastics without exception, and banished from France those who refused to take it. Unfortunately for the nation, there remained too great a number still; and it was afterwards discovered, without ability to remedy the evil, that this same clergy had prepared the ruin of the national liberties, and the triumph of despotism.

The republican armies were every where victorious. The countries lying on this side of the Rhine were completely subjugated; it only remained to conquer Italy to break up the coalition. This mission was confided to General Bonaparte, then but twenty-seven years old. Brilliant successes signalled the arrival of this young chief, who was one day to fill the world with his military glory. The Austrians and Piedmontese were routed by the republican soldiery, who were scarcely armed, and without shoes; and the pope soon trembled for his temporal sovereignty.

Pius the Sixth endeavoured then to levy troops; and to repair the penury of his treasury he issued billets, a species of payment whose circulation he forced by compelling the shopkeepers of Rome to receive them in exchange for specie. But the rapid march of the French surprised him in his preparations, and prevented him from putting his warlike plans into execution. The wary pontiff then feigned to wish to enter into an arrangement with General Bonaparte, and sent to him the Spanish ambassador, the chevalier Azara, to ask of him an armistice, and to offer to buy peace by ceding the legations of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna, the payment of a contribution of fifteen millions of francs, and the surrender of the master-pieces of art of ancient Greece and modern Italy, which adorned the galleries of the Vatican.

The armistice granted, Pius the Sixth, who had only thought of gaining time, and not of fulfilling the conditions stipulated in his name, hastened to take advantage of the time to put his armaments in a state of activity. By his orders, legions of priests spread themselves through all the cities of the patrimony of St. Peter, and embittered the fanatical population against the French by furious preaching. In order to increase the enthusiasm of the devotees, he opened the treasuries of celestial liberalities, and promised, in a bull, forty thousand years of indulgences to all those who should aid in repulsing the republicans. The following was the tenor of this brief:

"To all our well-beloved and Catholic children, brethren in Jesus Christ: We order you, for the good of Christendom, to take up arms; and that no one may hesitate to accomplish our wishes, we inform you, that by virtue of our sovereign power, we grant forty thousand years of indulgences to those who shall range themselves under our banner, and celestial beatitude to those who shall have slain only one of our enemies! . . ." Independently of these machinations, his holiness was careful to send emissaries to the emperor of Austria, to obtain succours.

Bonaparte, informed of what was going on, immediately informed the court of Rome, that he would at once commence hostilities, if the pope did not stop his intrigues, and at once fulfil his engagements with the republic. Pius the Sixth appeared resigned to obedience; he assembled in an immense gallery the tableaux destined for the ransom of Rome; he drew from the castle of San Angelo all the money which remained in the famous treasury of Quintus the Fifth; he constrained the churches, convents, pious houses, and congregations to surrender to him their ornaments and precious vessels which were not absolutely necessary for the celebration of divine service; he compelled all his subjects to surrender their plate, and even searched their houses for precious stones, golden ornaments, and even the rings of the women. When he had accumulated in his treasury all the wealth of his people, he informed the French general that he was ready to satisfy the republic.

The commissaries of the directory went immediately to Rome, to receive the pledges of the capitulation, and inform Pius the Sixth that it was the will of France that he should retract, disavow, and annul all bulls, decisions, sentences, censures, edicts, mandamuses and generally all writings emanating from the Holy See since the commencement of the revolution; that he should abolish the inquisition in all Catholic countries, and suppress the barbarous practice of castration on children destined to chant in the churches.

These conditions, which added nothing to the material part of the treaty and which were made for a humane end, appeared to excite the anger of the pope to the highest point. His holiness maintained that their only tendency was to deny his infallibility, to make him avow in the face of Europe, that he was an impostor, and that religion was only composed of absurd or odious practices.

He asked for a consultation with the sacred college, as to the measures he was to take under the circumstance. It was a new ruse to gain time and put off the fulfilment of the execution of the treaty, until the arrival of the Austrian troops would permit him to break openly with the republic.

In fact, as soon as it was known at Rome, that Austria had resumed the offensive, the priests recommenced preaching; the pope redoubled his activity to procure pecuniary resources; he altered the money; compelled the cultivators to sell their grain at a low price, and for paper billets to provision the troops; he organised a civic guard, built embattled guard-houses in all the quarters of Rome, and transformed the holy city into an arsenal. On all sides were seen but soldiers and carts laden with muskets, cannon; tents, and materials of all kinds. The enthusiasm communicated itself even to the Romans; contributions flowed into the apostolic treasury; gold, silver, jewels, provisions, beasts, all that they possessed, was placed at the disposal of the holy father. Several rich citizens raised bodies of troops at their own expense; the constable Colonna equipped an entire regiment of infantry; the banker Torlonia armed a company of calvary; it was a sort of madness which had seized all their heads.

In order to produce this result, Pius the Sixth had employed great means. All the convents of the ecclesiastical states had received orders to set their madonnas to playing. In the villages the statues of the Virgin moved their arms, opened their eyes, raised their legs; in the cities the crucifixes sweated blood and oil; at Ancona St. Cyriacus uttered long bursts of laughter; at Rome the skulls of St. Peter and St. Paul sang hymns, and what was most extraordinary, most miraculous was, that in the presence of the pope, the cardinals, and more than eighty thousand persons, a madonna walked, moved her head three times, rolled her eyes in their orbits, and uttered groans. These juggleries, executed by means of automata, alarmed the gross minds of the Romans, and raised the exasperation of fanatics to its height.

Pius the Sixth, had at last the satisfaction of seeing his execrable policy produce the results which he expected; on the day of the outbreak, bands of monks, sbirri, and misguided fanatics, surrounded the palace of the commissaries of the republic, and vociferated threats of death, which would have been without doubt executed, had it not of been for the interference of the chevalier Azara, the ambassador of Spain; repulsed from the palace of the ambassador, they spread howling through the streets of Rome, assassinating all the French they met to the cries of "Long live Mary! Long live Pius the Sixth!" they then went into the interior to accomplish their mission as executioners.

Fortunately new victories gained by Bonaparte over the Austrians, forced the pope to put an end to these scenes of carnage. Pius, fearful of drawing the French army to Rome, wrote in haste to the general, to make protestations of his good intentions towards the republic. He at the same time sent a message to the emperor of Austria, to obtain the aid of ten thousand soldiers, and informed him that he had made excellent arrangements to organise a civil war in France; he also informed him, that he was amusing the republican commissaries, whilst awaiting the arrival of the Austrians, and that immediately on the junction of the two armies, he would replace the tiara of the popes with the casque of the Cæsars, display the famous labarum of Constantine, and march at the head of the soldiers to combat the proud Corsican and his brigands.

This letter fell most mal-appropriately into the hands of Bonaparte; the armistice was immediately broken off, the French army entered the territory of the church, and in fifteen days conquered half of it. It was hoped that the infamous Pius would then receive the just punishment of his knaveries and his crimes. It was not so; whether Bonaparte wished to take advantage of the occasion to resist the directory, who had ordered him to seize on Rome, or whether he thought the existence of the religious authority useful for his profound and secret designs, he stopped his march and proposed a negotiation, which was promptly accepted. His holiness sent as his plenipotentiaries to the French general, his nephew, the duke de Braschi, the marquis Camillus Massini, the cardinal Mattei and Monsignor Galoppi, with full powers to treat of peace. It was agreed between them and the general-in-chief of the army in Italy, that the Holy See should pay thirty-one millions of francs to the republic, should settle a pension on the family of the unfortunate Basseville, who was assassinated at Rome, should surrender Avignon, Bologna, Ferrara, and Modena for ever to France, and should receive a French garrison in Ancona. This arrangement signed, Bonaparte went immediately towards the Tyrol, leaving fifteen thousand men under the command of General Victor, to guard the conquered countries and see to the execution of the treaties.

Pius the Sixth again endeavoured to appease the storm; but these shocks, this incessant disquietude, and above all his debauchery with the beautiful dutchess de Braschi, his daughter, had given a fatal blow to his health, and a few days after the conclusion of the treaty of Tolentino, he fell so sick, that they began to think of giving him a successor.

His two bastards, Romuald and the duke de Braschi, hastened to lay hands on the treasures collected in the Vatican, and destined to pay the ransom of Rome. But as the citizens had exhausted all their resources to raise the millions demanded by Bonaparte, and were beginning to partake of the ideas of the French in regard to priests and kings, they rose at this new spoliation, went to the palace of the duke de Braschi, and forced him to leave the city to shun the popular vengeance. Unfortunately, the pope recovered, and things were restored to their former footing; only his holiness dared not increase the taxes to satisfy the exigences of the treaty of Tolentino, and turned towards the clergy to replace the sums stolen by his nephews.

The priests, threatened in their property, turned immediately against the pope, cried out tyranny, called the people to revolt, accused Pius the Sixth of all the calamities which had fallen on Rome, and dared, in their sermons, to designate the holy pontiff by the names of stupid, incestuous, sodomite, and robber. They made a poor girl, named Labrousse, play the part of a prophetess, who announced publicly that the empire of the pope was approaching its termination; that heaven was tired of the reign of these infamous impostors, and that Pius the Sixth was about to be hurled from the throne of the apostle.

It was in the midst of these circumstances that Joseph Bonaparte, the brother of the general-in-chief of the armies of Italy, arrived in Rome, to claim the execution of the treaties of Tolentino, and to demand the enlargement of all Italians who were incarcerated for their political opinions. As soon as this was known in Rome, the city changed its appearance as if by enchantment; the noblest enthusiasm succeeded to stupor. In an instant the streets, the public places, highways, were filled with crowds of people, who made the air resound with patriotic acclamations and with threats of death against Pius the Sixth; then this immense multitude, as if urged on by the same inspiration, rushes to the Transteverine quarter and spreads the tricoloured flag amid cries, a thousand times repeated, of "Huzza for liberty! Huzza for France!"

These manifestations, these cries, these menaces, exasperate the old pope, he wishes to reason with those Romans, who had been accustomed, for so many ages, to bow the head cowardly beneath the yoke; he wishes to try, by an act of cruelty, to retain the power which is escaping from him, and orders his sbirri to charge the people. The soldiers of the execrable Pius fall on the citizens, massacre women, children, and old men, beat down the flying with their balls, cover the streets with dead bodies, pursue the unfortunate who had taken refuge in the palace of the French embassy, and transform that inviolable asylum into a field of carnage. Joseph Bonaparte, General Duphot, and the officers of the embassy immediately rushed forward to stop the massacres. At the sight of them, the rage of the sbirri appears to redouble, and the officer who directs the butchery, cries out in a loud voice, "Kill, kill, these are French." At the same moment, General Duphot falls mortally wounded by a ball; the commissary and the officers only escape the same fate by retreating up the staircase of the palace. At length the ambassadors of the foreign powers, warned by an express, hasten thither with their suites, and come in time to disengage the representatives of the republic, and prevent new assassinations.

The chevalier Azara, in the name of the diplomatic body, went at once to the Vatican, to address energetic remonstrances to the pope on the atrocity of his conduct; but the infamous Pius feigned extreme surprise; swore on a crucifix that he had given no order, and even dared to say that he was entirely ignorant of all that had passed in the city, since he had been shut up in his oratory for several hours, occupied in praying to God for the republic. Joseph Bonaparte, indignant at such an excess of impudence and hypocrisy, informed him that he would quit Rome, unless he at once obtained satisfaction for the murder of General Duphot. Fourteen hours passed by without any ecclesiastical officer presenting himself in the name of his holiness to announce to him that he would proceed against the guilty. The ambassador then executed his threat and departed for Florence.

It was not in Rome only that the pontiff had organised massacres against the French and their partizans; on almost the same day, like scenes took place in the principal cities of the states of the church, and in Venice; at Verona, especially, the priests had shown a boldly ferocious cruelty; not only were several thousand inoffensive men murdered by their orders, but, shame for ever on those wretches, they led bands of assassins into the hospitals, who tore from their beds four hundred sick or wounded French, who were all pitilessly stabbed or thrown into the Adige.

The people of Italy at last opened their eyes to the crimes of Pius the Sixth, and commenced joining the republic; at Milan, the indignation which the conduct of the pope excited, produced an explosion in all circles and in all assemblies. Every where were heard cries of "Death to the pontiff assassin, vengeance for the French, our liberators." An Italian patriot even pronounced a public discourse, in which he expressed the wish, "That the Tiber would soon roll its majestic waves amidst a free people, and that the blood of a pope would purify the earth from eighteen centuries of crime, shame, and servitude."

General Berthier, charged with avenging the republic on the attempts of Pius the Sixth, marched on Rome at the head of his troops, and passed through the states of the church with as much security as if he had been traversing French departments; he was every where received with transports of joy. In vain did the cardinals, priests, and all the black cohorts of monks and Jesuits endeavour to kindle the fanaticism of the populace; their voices found no echoes: in vain did saints and madonnas move their arms and legs, roll their eyes, and sing psalms; no one rose against the republican army. Nay, Berthier had not yet arrived beneath the walls of Rome, when the citizens had already proclaimed their independence, and planted the tree of liberty before the capitol and in all the public places.

As soon as the French columns appeared, a deputation went to meet them, to announce to the general that free Rome opened its gates to the regenerators of nations. Berthier immediately entered the city, in the midst of an incredible number of citizens, to the sound of trumpets, accompanied by his staff, a hundred soldiers of the different regiments of cavalry, and the grenadiers of his army. When he arrived at the foot of the capitol he halted, and pronounced the following discourse before an immense auditory: "Manes of the Catos, Pompeys, Ciceros, and Brutuses, receive the homage of the free French, in that capitol in which you have so often defended the rights of the people, and illustrated the Roman republic. The children of the Gauls, with the olive branch of peace in their hands, come to this august place to restore the altars of liberty erected by the first Brutus! Are you Romans, who come to reconquer your lawful rights? recollect your glorious ancestors, cast your eyes on the sacred monuments which surround you, and resume your ancient greatness, and the virtues of your fathers."

Frenzied acclamations replied to the address of the republican general. After this imposing ceremony, Berthier returned to his camp. Pius the Sixth, still shut up in the Vatican, wished to endeavour to disarm his formidable foe; he sent the most eminent persons of his court to him to treat of peace, and obtain a favourable capitulation. But the firmness of Berthier soon dissipated the illusions of the pope; the general refused to receive the deputation; he informed the envoys that he no longer recognised the sovereignty of the pope, and that he only admitted the delegates of the Roman republic to his presence.

The citizens had already constituted a government on the model of the ancient constitutions of Rome, had appointed seven consuls, decreed the downfall of Pius the Sixth, and brought some cardinals to trial as spoliators and peculators. Assured of the assistance of France, after the reply of the republican general to the overtures of the pope, the new heads of the Roman government proceeded to acts of high justice. They placed seals on the museums, galleries, and all the precious objects which decorated the churches, to place them beyond the reach of the rapacity of the pontiff; they sold for the benefit of the state the statues and vases which adorned the splendid villa of Cardinal Albani, and the palace of Cardinal Busca at Santa Agatha dei Monti, two prelates who had shared in all the robberies committed by the bastards of the pope; they expelled several cardinals from Rome; threw into prison Doria, the secretary of state, the politico Antonelli, the astute della Somaglia, with their worthy acolytes Borgia, Caranda, Roverella, Carandini, Vincenti and Mattei, to have them judged by the tribunals. The famous Abbe Maury, who had been made a cardinal by Pius the Sixth, as the price of services rendered to despotism, was fortunate enough to get out of Rome and escape public vengeance. As for the pope and his two bastards, the people, always great, always merciful, pardoned their lives and contented themselves with taking from them their rich domains, the palaces, and the trea-asures stolen from the nation, or acquired with the public funds.

The dutchess de Braschi, that shameless courtesan, doubly incestuous with her brother and her father, the wife of one, and the mistress of the other, was treated with still more indulgence; the consuls left with her a part of the ornaments and precious stones given her by the pope, and exiled her to Tivoli, where she consoled herself in the arms of another lover for the ruin of her family.

All these catastrophes had cast the pope into a despondency, which amounted almost to idiocy. At last the governor of Rome, General Cervoni, inflicted the last blow on him, by informing him officially that the people had reconquered their rights, and that he was no longer any thing in the government. "And my dignity," exclaimed the pope, anxiously, "what becomes of it?"—"It will be preserved to you," replied the general, "and a pension of two thousand Roman crowns is granted to you to maintain your rank."—"And my person, what is to become of it?"—"It is safe," replied Cervoni, "and they even grant you a hundred men for your guard."—"I am still pope then," exclaimed the holy father, with a strange laugh. The governor of Rome having retired, the old audacity of the pontiff seemed to rekindle. He called to him his chamberlain and his attendants, and prepared with them plans for new Sicilian vespers, in which were to be engulfed all the French, and all the partizans of the new government. Fortunately, they were apprised of what was going on, and made arrangements to arrest the execution of these criminal plans.

The removal of Pius the Sixth was one of these measures. In vain did the old pope, who saw all his plans thus disconcerted, wish to protest against the violence which was done him, and which tore him from his people and his duties; he was placed in a carriage with his physician, his steward, and his cook, and driven towards Tuscany. He was first placed in the convent of St. Augustine of Sienna, where he remained three months. He lived there peaceably, and almost forgotten by the world, when an extraordinary event, an earthquake, shook the asylum which had been given him, and destroyed some of the walls of the building. Although he had incurred no danger, since, at the time of the catastrophe, he was walking in the gardens of the city, he was so alarmed that he was unwilling to re-enter the convent. They placed at once at his disposal a country house, called "The Lower Regions," which induced sarcasms of the irreligious, and made them say, that the holy father was at last in his place. Some time afterwards he was transferred to the grand chartreuse of Florence, where he remained three months.

But in his exile, the old pope had not renounced the hope of being avenged on the French; from the depth of Tuscany he organised insurrections, and Rome soon became the theatre of frightful massacres. Bands of fanatics, led by priests and monks, with a crucifix in one hand, and a torch in the other, traversed the streets and the public places; the French fell every where, assassinated by blessed daggers, to the shouts of "Huzza for Mary! Huzza for Pius the Sixth!" The Italian patriots were cast into the Tiber; a whole company of the guard of the Vatican was surprised, and murdered to the last man. It was difficult to foresee where these assassins would have stopped, if General Vial had not marched against them at the head of his troops, and seized the most mutinous.

Those who escaped from the republican general fled to the country, and excited the fanaticism of the inhabitants of Albano, la Riccia, Genzano, and Villettri, and returned towards Rome with a body of six thousand men. They even dared to give battle to the French. The engagement took place at Frotocchi, but it was not of long duration; at the first charge they fled and yielded the field of battle.

His holiness was not content with creating embarrassments to the republic in the heart of Rome itself; he laboured to excite enemies to it in the other parts of Italy. In concert with England, he intrigued through his agents with the imbecile Ferdinand the Fourth, king of Naples, and his shameless wife, Marie Caroline, and induced them to declare war on the French nation.

The king of the Two Sicilies was for a short time victorious; Rome, destitute of troops, fell into the power of the Neapolitans; the French, pressed on all sides by an innumerable army, were compelled to retreat. But they soon took their revenge under general Championnet; the enemy were in their turn driven back, even to Naples, and constrained to surrender. Ferdinand the Fourth was hurled from the throne, and the Parthenopean republic proclaimed.

His eminence, Cardinal Ruffo, the minister of the king, and the indefatigable agent of ultra montanism, then threw himself into the Calabrias, excited insurrections among the ignorant inhabitants of these countries, hoisted the white cross as a signal for a crusade against the republicans, distributed indulgences and blessings, raised an army of brigands, and marched on Naples at the head of his bands.

The French, attacked by sea and land, were again obliged to retreat, and the Neapolitan patriots were compelled to capitulate to the royal army. They did not, however, surrender until they had obtained permission to leave the kingdom with their property. As soon as Cardinal Ruffo entered the capital, shame for ever on him! shame on Ferdinand the Fourth and Marie Caroline! shame on England and Admiral Nelson, in contempt of a treaty clothed with the royal seal, guaranteed by the representative of Great Britain, that execrable priest arrested all the citizens suspected of republicanism, and had them judged by a special tribunal called the Junta. As many as three hundred executions were counted in a day; and as if this commission of executioners was not yet enough to exterminate the unfortunate Neapolitans, who had given in their adherence to the Parthenopean republic, Ruffo excited his barbarous Calabrese to pillage, incendiarism, rape, and murder, and transformed the opulent city of Naples into a vast plain of carnage.

Pius the Sixth learned, with indescribable transports, the success of his machinations, and being unable to restrain, in his heart, the joy which he experienced, he addressed a brief to all Christian bishops, to announce the triumph gained over the enemies of the church, and also to announce that the time was near in which the papacy would sally forth, radiant, from the dungeons in which it had been crucified in his person. His holiness called on the priests of all countries to draw near kings, to aid them with their counsels, their prayers, and if necessary, with their arms, in order to bring back the people beneath their sway, and to put an end more promptly to the revolutionary hydra.

The holy father felt so satisfied of a rapid change in his fortune, that he recalled his nephew the duke de Braschi to him. The handsome minion, who knew that his uncle had considerable sums, and a large quantity of precious stones, hastened to Florence, took advantage of his state of suffering, which prevented him from rising, and stole his treasures; then, on the news that the directory, tired of the incessant efforts of the pope, had determined to transfer him to France, he fled from Tuscany like a thief, with the gold and precious stones of his uncle. Pius the Sixth left Florence in charge of the commissioners of the republic, and went towards Turin; he crossed the Alps, and arrived at Valens, in Dauphiny, which had been designated as his place of exile.

By order of the directory he was installed in the apartments of the governor of the citadel; they showed him all the attention which a free people never cease to bestow on an enemy whom they have conquered; they even permitted him to form a court of all his servants, and the priests who had accompanied him; but nothing could console the old pope in his exile; the last ingratitude of his cherished bastard had inflicted a terrible blow on him. Moreover, the resources of life were singularly used up by age, debaucheries, and excesses at the table; a paralysis, which had at first fallen on his limbs, extended to his entrails, and freed the earth, on the 29th of August, 1799, of the last pontiff of the eighteenth century.

Alas! God had not yet decided, in his immutable decrees, the ruin of the execrable institution of the papacy; after Pius the Sixth, other pontiffs were yet to sit on the dishonoured chair of the apostle; sacrilegious hymns were yet to resound beneath the roofs of the Vatican, and tyrants celebrate the triumphal march of despotism over liberty.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

PIUS THE SEVENTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY-NINTH POPE.

Conclave at Venice—Bonaparte, consul, has the monk Chiaramonti chosen pope, by the name of Pius the Seventh—Origin of the new pontiff—His republican doctrines—He calls the first consul the eldest son of the church—He gives the same title to the count of Provence—Knavery of the holy father—Concordat of 1801—Pius the Seventh re-establishes the Jesuits in Russia—Catholic reaction in France—Organization of the episcopal sees—Publication of the organic articles—The pope protests against this addition to the concordat—Divisions among the French prelates—Political changes in France—Bonaparte is proclaimed emperor of the French by the name of Napoleon the First—Pius the Seventh receives orders to come to Paris to consecrate him—Cowardly obsequiousness of the holy father to Bonaparte—The pope wishes to canonise one of the relatives of the emperor—Ridiculous pretensions of the sovereign pontiff—Rupture between the altar and the throne—Return of Pius the Seventh—He becomes the most bitter foe of Napoleon—Letters of the emperor to his holiness—The French take military possession of the holy city—Pius the Seventh is deprived of his temporal sovereignty—The pope excommunicates the emperor—His holiness is conducted a prisoner to Savona—The red and black cardinals—National council—Concessions of the holy father—Pontifical brief—Pius the Seventh is conducted to France—He signs a new concordat at Fontainebleau—Retraction of the pope—His holiness rejects the concordat he had granted by virtue of his infallible power, and declares that he acted under the inspiration of the spirit of darkness—Napoleon sends the pontiff back into Italy—Bull for the solemn re-establishment of the Jesuits throughout Europe—Fall of the emperor—Return of the Bourbons into France—Pius the Seventh sends to compliment Louis the Eighteenth—Provisional arrangement for the Gallican church—Religious persecutions—Death of the pontiff.

THE nineteenth century opened under the most favourable auspices for the people; kings, who for so many years had ruled the nations by fear, were, in their turn, trembling on their tottering thrones; priests, who for fourteen centuries had reigned despotically over consciences, to the misfortune of mankind, were reduced to conspire in the dark; the papacy, that fatal and monstrous institution, which had been the cause of so many calamities, so many disasters, so many persecutions, found itself, since the death of Pius the Sixth, on the eve of being completely annihilated. But men were not yet sufficiently freed from superstition, and the triumph of liberty was yet deferred.

Bonaparte, consul, who had already thought of covering his brow with the diadem of Charlemagne, and foresaw the moment when he would need a new Leo the Third to consecrate him, collected together the scattered stones of the pontifical Babel, which the republic had dispersed, and rebuilt it. Twenty days after his advent to power, thirty-five cardinals assembled in Venice, to put an end to the vacancy in the Holy See, and to give a new head to the church.

Each power intrigued as usual to have one of its creatures appointed, and sought to assure itself of the votes; France succeeded, either because it was most skilfully served, or paid best. After a hundred and four days of discussion and strife, Cardinal Barnabas Louis Chiaramonti carried it, and was proclaimed pope on the 4th of March, 1800, by the name of Pius the Seventh.

The new pontiff was only fifty-eight years old; he came from Cesena, and was the son of Count Scipio Chiaramonti and the countess Ghini. His parents had entered him when very young into the order of the Benedictines. Afterwards Pius the Sixth, who was allied to his family, had raised him in succession to the dignity of abbot, bishop of Tivoli, then of Imola, and, finally of cardinal. In these different positions he had given proof of extreme flexibility of opinions; thus, after having been an extravagant partizan of absolutism, he had suddenly turned to liberalism; and on the occasion of the enclosure of his diocese in the Cisalpine republic, had pronounced a superb homily, in which he proved, by relying on texts of scripture, that in order to be a good Christian, one must be a democrat. The wary cardinal had foreseen that, by affecting liberal sentiments he assured himself of the protection of France, and prepared the way to the pontifical throne.

Having become pope, he pursued the crafty policy which had procured him the tiara; he exhausted all forms of adulatory thanks to the consul Bonaparte, for the assistance he had afforded him; he proclaimed him the chosen of God, the surpassingly just. As we may suppose, all these base flatteries had an interested purpose; it was to obtain the interference of France to constrain the emperor of Germany to permit him to leave Venice, and renounce his plan of establishing the Holy See at Vienna.

The first consul listened favourably to his requests, and informed Francis the Second, that he must place no obstacle in the way of the departure of Pius the Seventh. His sickness embarked, reached Pesaro, and took the road for Rome. The French no longer occupied the apostolic city, and had been replaced by the Neapolitans. The pope thought it was good policy to have protectors on both sides; and, to make his court to the Bourbons, he hastened to inform the count of Provence, officially, of his exaltation, giving him the title of "King of France and eldest Son of the Church." Then, on the news that the first consul had crossed the Alps, and was invading Italy a second time, at the head of a formidable army, he wrote to him, gave him also the title of "Most Christian Prince, eldest Son of the Church," and opened the first negotiations in relation to the famous concordat, which was definitively concluded in the following year, on the 15th of July, 1801.

By this convention, Pius the Seventh transferred to the head of the French government the rights and prerogatives which the ancient kings had enjoyed near the Holy See; he even authorised the priests to take the oath of fidelity to Bonaparte, without troubling himself farther about the divine right of the fallen dynasty. The pope only reserved to himself the canonical institution of the bishops, in order to be able to paralyse the action of religion in France, so as to suit his interests. The first consul had the weakness to accede to this clause, either because he did not foresee all the consequences, or because he wished, by this compliance, to assure himself of the devotion of Pius the Seventh to further his ulterior designs. It is true, that as a compensation, his holiness placed the French clergy at the feet of the conqueror, and imposed on the priests an obligation to reveal to the government all the conspiracies of which they should obtain a knowledge; that is to say, should envelope the royalists in a vast net, and use religion as a kind of sacred espionage.

The concordat was scarcely signed, when Pius the Seventh entered openly on the path of Catholic reaction, re-established the company of the Jesuits in Russia, and sent the good fathers into France, by the name of the Adorers of the Sacred Heart, and Associates of the Faith. Converts reappeared, professed houses were reopened, and from them were launched forth thousands of fanatics, commissioned to degrade and subjugate the people.

His holiness had been too fast in his work; the mass of the nation was alarmed at the efforts of the clergy, and pronounced so energetically against a return to Catholic superstitions, that the consular government was obliged to defer the publication of the concordat concluded with the Holy See, until the 13th of April, 1802. Bonaparte having had time, in the interval, to reduce men to submission to him, the pope was enabled to employ himself about the reorganization of the high clergy of France.

Out of a hundred and thirty-five episcopal sees which existed before the revolution, fifty-four were vacant in consequence of the death or renunciation of the titularies, and many others in consequence of the voluntary absence of their pastors, who had refused to take the civic oath, and had emigrated. In the conquered countries of Germany, Flanders, and Savoy, out of twenty-four dioceses, ten were also vacant from like causes. The sovereign pontiff addressed a bull to the constitutional bishops, and the prelates who had not taken the oath, to hand in their resignations, and consent to a new election for the interest of the church. The sworn-in pastors obeyed, and deposited their powers in the hands of the consuls. It was not so with the rebel bishops who had fled to foreign countries, and who regarded themselves as martyrs: they refused to adhere to the measures commanded by the court of Rome, and called the pontifical bull violent and irregular. Pius the Seventh went on, declared all the old churches suppressed, and promulgated a decree which authorised a new division of the territory of the republic into ten archbishoprics, and fifty-nine bishoprics. He then sent the cardinal Caprara, as his legate a latere, to Paris, with the most extensive powers, to regulate, in concurrence with the minister of worship, Portalis, all that had connection with religion.

His eminence had an audience of the first consul on the day succeeding his arrival. Immediately afterwards he went to work to deliver the bulls of canonical institution to the prelates designated by Bonaparte. Things went on very smoothly; the exercise of the Catholic worship was solemnly re-established in France, and the legate, as a token of satisfaction, published an extraordinary jubilee, that the faithful might be enabled to purchase pardon for their faults. A very small number consented to encourage the traffic in indulgences; the majority of the nation remained indifferent; some energetic men, who were sincerely devoted to their country, even dared to blame the conduct of the first consul. General Lannes, amongst others, said on this occasion, "Bonaparte steep himself in the holy water. Holy water will drown him."

He was not long in discovering the capital fault he had committed in becoming dependent on the court of Rome. The concordat was scarcely promulgated when he sought to regain, gradually, the authority of which he had deprived himself so improperly, by publishing organic articles, which were none others than the four propositions of the French clergy, and the maxims of the Gallican church contained in the pragmatic sanction. These articles rendered the authority of the government indispensable for the publication of bulls, briefs, and rescripts from Rome, as also for the lawful exercise of the powers of nuncios, legates, and envoys from the Holy See; they authorised a recourse to the council of state in case of abuse of power by the pope; rendered vain all exemption from the jurisdiction of the ordinary, and forbade the instruction of the four celebrated articles of 1682. His holiness, irritated at seeing the first council place obstacles in the way of his plans of absolute sway, protested against the organic articles as hostile to religion, and contrary to the doctrines of the church, and secretly fomented divisions among the French clergy. Thirty-six bishops, at his instigation, drew up a protest against the measures taken by government in regard to the diminution of the old number of bishoprics; they protested forcibly against the subjugation of the spiritual power to the temporal authority; they lashed as apostates the prelates who accepted them, and excommunicated them; they even attacked the apostolical bulls, and drew up a manifesto in favour of the rights of Louis the Eighteenth to the throne, rights, they said, he held of God, and which imposed on the French, by virtue of the religious law; rights from which nothing could free them. These positions, called canonical, were intended to weaken the oath of fidelity to the established government, to excite a schism in the church, and to revive the old pretensions of the popes over France; but the hypocritical Chiaramonti had to do with a more skilful man than himself, and was to succumb in the strife.

Bonaparte, who, since the 18th of Brumaire, had had himself appointed successively first consul, consul for life, and finally, emperor, instead of addressing recriminations to him concerning the conduct of the bishops, simply informed him through Cardinal Fesch, his uncle, the ambassador of France at Rome, that he desired his holiness to start at once for Paris, to come to consecrate him in his capital. The pope, not daring to resist the wishes of the new Cæsar, assembled the consistory, informed the cardinals of his determination to cross the Alps, appointed Gonzalvi to replace him in the political government of Rome, and left the apostolic city on the 2d of November. At Turin he found several persons, sent by Napoleon to increase his train, and render his journey more imposing. He arrived at Fontainebleau on the 26th, where the emperor awaited him. He remained there several days to recruit, and on the 28th of November started with Napoleon to make his entrance into Paris. The refractory bishops imitated the conduct of the pope and submitted.

On the day appointed for the consecration, Pius the Seventh went to the church of Notre Dame, clothed in a cape glittering with precious stones, the tiara on his head, escorted by a numerous clergy, and preceded, according to the Roman usage, by an officer carrying the sacred slipper on a cushion, which excited the mirth of the Parisians, and greatly injured the gravity of the cortege. He had by his side two assistant cardinal deacons; the cardinal Braschi, the nephew of Pius the Sixth, and the cardinal de Bagano; a little in advance were the cardinal bishop Antonelli and the cardinal deacon de l'Évangile Casselli. His holiness was conducted to one of the thrones, which had been erected in the interior of the nave, to wait for the emperor. As soon as his majesty entered, the ceremony commenced. Napoleon placed himself on his knees to receive, with the empress, the sacred anointing; he then rose, and without waiting for Pius the Seventh to crown him, took the diadem from his hands, placed it on his head, and then crowned Josephine.

On the day succeeding this grand solemnity, Chiaramonti, who cherished the secret hope of making his compliance advantageous for the interests of the Holy See, claimed the abolition of the organic articles. Napoleon did not show any disposition to sacrifice the rights of his crown to his gratitude, and refused to yield to his desires. Pius was not rebuffed, he returned to the charge, and in order to carry the matter, set to work a means which he regarded as infallible. He proposed to the emperor to canonise a poor fellow, called brother Bonaventure Bonaparte, who had died in a convent some hundred years before. To the great astonishment of his holiness, Napoleon, instead of being touched by the illustrious honour which he desired to confer upon his family, protested against the ridicule which would fall upon him, and declared that he should oppose, with all his might, the making a saint out of the monk Bonaventure. This second refusal greatly indisposed the pope against his host; but he dared not show his secret sentiments, on the contrary, he affected to lavish on him more than ever testimonials of his friendship, and on the mere proposal of Portalis, minister of worship, he granted the hat of a cardinal to Cambaceres, as well as to du Belloy; he then erected Ratisbon into the metropolis of all Germany. It is true, that the minister had consented, in exchange, to grant some claims which he had drawn up in a memoir, and which were eleven principal ones:—"The abolition of divorce, as incompatible with the principle of indissolubility of marriage taught by the church; the absolute inspection by the bishops over the morals and conduct of the clergy who were dependent on them; means for the Catholic clergy to live decently, and to maintain for themselves the interest of the sacerdotal caste; the renewing of the old laws concerning the celebration of Sundays and feast days; the exclusion of public education from all married priests or devotees; the submission of the French clergy to the judgments of the Holy See; the restoration of the religious establishments and congregations which the revolution had abolished; allowances for the Lazarists, the seminary of foreign missions and that of the Holy Spirit; and finally, an equivalent in money for the abbey of Clairac, given to the Holy See by the renegade, Henry the Fourth, at the time of his last abjuration."

Several of these things were immediately granted to his holiness, others were put off to a more remote time. These first concessions induced the pope to draw up a new memorial on the political affairs of Italy. In this singular piece Pius the Seventh claimed the post of administrator of the patrimony of St. Peter, with the possession of the apostolic domains, which were annexed to the territory of the French empire, or to that of the Italian republic, and to excite the generosity of the conqueror, he lavished on him all the forms of the most servile adulation. Napoleon remained insensible to this excess of degradation; he did not even reply formally to Chiaramonti, and contented himself with replying to him, through his minister, that he would never consent to dismember his empire, still less to diminish the territory of a people who had given it to him, in order to increase the dominions of an ambitious priest. And without troubling himself any more about Pius the Seventh, he left Pius, crossed the Alps, and was crowned king of Italy at Milan.

Though disappointed in his pretensions, Chiaramonti was unwilling to go from France without leaving upon its soil traces of his passage. At his voice cohorts of Jesuits sprang from beneath the earth, formed themselves into a society by the name of the Fathers of the Faith, and spread themselves through all the provinces. His holiness then retook the route to his dominions; but on removing from the capital, he carried with him a profound, implacable hatred, the hatred of a priest against the emperor. He gave proofs of it on the very day of his arrival at Rome, by anathematising the maxims of the Gallican church, by the confirmation of the bull "Auctorem Fidei," and by associating himself with the policy of the cabinet of St. James.

Napoleon replied to the pontifical bulls by imperial decrees, and by dismembering the Roman states piecemeal. His holiness, exasperated, summoned the eldest son of the church to declare, if it was his intention to despoil him of all his provinces. The emperor informed him, by his ambassador, that he was aware of the intrigues of the pontifical court, and that he would not respect the dominions of St. Peter, unless Pius the Seventh would drive the English from his ports, and give in his adhesion to the continental blockade. The pope, to whom such a measure was very disagreeable, and who dared not, however, enter upon an open struggle with the French, objected that religion imposed on him the duty of maintaining a neutrality, and of not closing his kingdom to foreigners.

To close all discussion, Napoleon placed garrisons in the ports of Ancona and Civita Vecchia, and gave to his brother Joseph the kingdom of Naples, the principalities of Beneventum and Ponte Corvo, which were included in it; he then informed the pontiff that he wished him to crown the new king of the Two Sicilies. Chiaramonti still refused to comply with the wishes of the emperor, pretending vain scruples of conscience. But the true motives for his conduct were the refusal of Joseph to receive the crown of Naples in the capacity of a vassal of the Holy See, and the hope that he entertained of seeing his enemy crushed by the combined forces of England, Russia, and Austria. The famous battle of Austerlitz, gained by the French, destroyed his illusions. He then sought to regain the good graces of Napoleon, and addressed crafty congratulations to him on his new victory; the emperor replied to him, that "if he did not wish to expose himself to a severe chastisement, he must walk in a straight line, shun the maze of politics, and not ally himself with heretical powers which were incapable of protecting him."

"All Italy," added Napoleon, in another letter on the same subject, "will be submissive to my law; but I will not touch the independence of the Holy See. I will even repay the expenses which the movements of my army have cost it, on condition that your holiness will have the same regard towards me in temporal affairs, that I have towards you in spiritual, and then you will put an end to useless overtures to heretical enemies of the church, and to powers that cannot do you any good. You are the sovereign of Rome, but I am its emperor. All my enemies must be yours. You must not then permit any agent of the king of Sardinia, nor any Englishman, Russian, or Swede to reside at Rome, nor in your dominions, nor any vessel pertaining to those powers, to enter your porte. I will still have for your holiness, the filial deference which I have shown to you under all circumstances; in return, you will remember that I am accountable to God for the good of the people. How then can I, without grief, see religion compromised by the delays of the court of Rome, by miserable pretensions? How will they answer to God, who show so much zeal in patronizing marriages with protestants, and wish to oblige me to unite the members of my family with heretics? How will they answer to God who retard the expediting of the bulls of my bishops, and give up my dioceses to anarchy? It was six months before the prelates could enter upon the exercise of them, and it might have been arranged in eight days.

"In the affairs of Italy, I have done every thing for the bishops; I have consolidated the interests of the church; I have touched nothing spiritual, neither at Milan nor Naples, nor in any of the cities over which my power is extended. I do not decline intercourse with men endowed with a true zeal for religion, and converse with them; but since God has committed the maintenance of religion to me, I will act without the court of Rome, if it remains in guilty inaction. If your holiness had followed the advice I gave you at Paris, the religion of Germany would be organised, and not be in the bad condition in which it is. In that country, and in Italy, all would have been arranged in concert with the Holy See and properly. But I cannot permit a thing to languish for a year which might be done in fifteen days. It was not by sleeping that I have carried to so high a state the clergy and public worship, and reorganised religion in France, so that there is no country in which it is doing so much good, or is more respected, or enjoys more consideration. Those who hold any other language deceive you and will be the cause of great evils . . ."

Instead of listening to the voice of reason, and giving satisfaction to the emperor for his just complaints, the pontiff fell into a fit of rage on the receipt of this letter. He immediately assembled the consistory, and announced to the cardinals that he was about to engage in a terrible strife with France, and that he would not cease from it, until he had trampled the cockatrice beneath his feet.

Napoleon, as his only reply, sent troops, who took military occupation of Rome; he then incorporated the soldiers of the pope into his own regiments, seized the control of the posts and the press, sent off the foreign cardinals, in defiance of the protest of the sacred college, and had them conducted without the states of the church. His holiness, still more exasperated, sent a comminatory brief to the emperor, threatening him with pontifical thunders, if he did not hasten to recall his troops and implore pardon for his past conduct. Napoleon punished his presumption by annexing to the kingdom of Italy the handsomest provinces of the church, the March of Ancona, the duchy of Urbino, Macerata, and Camerino.

This vigorous action quieted the pope; for some months the court of Rome dared not make any hostile manifestation to France; but soon, on the news of the embarrassments of Napoleon in his war with Spain, the old audacity of Pius the Seventh reappeared, and intrigues were renewed with more activity than ever between the cabinets of St. James, Vienna, and the Quirinal palace. In consequence of these intrigues, the war was rekindled in Germany.

Napoleon darted with more rapidity than light, to chastise his enemies, gained the victories of Abensberg, Landshut, and Eckmühl, over the Austrian troops, and entered Vienna on the 13th of May, 1809. On the 17th, he issued his famous decree which declared the states of the church reunited to the French empire.

As soon as this measure was known at Rome, the holy father became violently enraged; he vociferated the most horrid imprecations against the emperor, France, the Italians, the English, all Christian nations, friendly or hostile, who had seconded him in his wars, or who had not conquered in the combats. When he had exhaled his anger in powerless threats, he thought of awakening the fanaticism of the people, and fulminated a bull of excommunication against Napoleon. His attempt was again foiled; the Italians remained indifferent; his manifesto only served to show to Europe into what discredit the thunders of the Vatican, so terrible in the hands of Gregory the Seventh, had fallen; independently of the disgrace which the pope experienced in this matter, he had the mortification to be taken from his palace and led into exile in the city of Savona.

A few days afterwards he learned that Napoleon, the conqueror of the Austrians at Wagram, had signed a treaty with Francis the First at Schönbrunn, and had imposed, as the first condition of peace, his marriage with the archduchess Maria Louisa, the eldest daughter of the emperor. This news took from Pius the Seventh his last hope; still he did not yield. Armed with the concordat of 1801, which gave him the right to confer the episcopate in France, he continued the war against Napoleon. The latter then discovered the enormous fault which he had committed in recognising the interference of the pope as necessary in the appointment of bishops; but it was too late, the conqueror of kings was constrained in some sort to obey a fanatical old man, and to leave several episcopal sees vacant, to which Pius the Seventh refused to give his sanction.

Serious divisions resulted from this among the high dignitaries of the clergy, and especially among the cardinals. Thus, on the celebration of the marriage of Napoleon with Maria Louisa, thirteen members of the sacred college, out of twenty-six who were at Paris, did not present themselves at the ceremony, under the pretext that the holy father had not authorised the divorce of the emperor from Josephine, and in reality to make their court to Pius the Seventh, the sole dispenser of places and benefices.

To put an end to this ridiculous strife, Napoleon determined to send the following declaration to the holy father through one of his prefects: "In accordance with the orders of his imperial and royal majesty, emperor of the French, king of Italy, protector of the confederation, etc., we are charged to notify Pope Pius the Seventh, that he is prohibited communication with any church of France, or any subject of the emperor, under penalty of disobedience on his part and theirs; warning him that he ceases to be the organ of the Catholic church, and that his majesty is about to have him deposed."

Napoleon, in fact, thought seriously of assembling a national council to judge the pope, abolish the concordat of 1801, and establish, in a dogmatic manner, the rights of metropolitans in regard to the institution of bishops. His holiness, restored to moderation by the imminence of the danger, then offered to make concessions, consented to enter into negotiations with the French envoys, and drew up a note, in which he offered canonically to constitute the bishops named by Napoleon; to extend the French concordat to Tuscany, Parma, and Placenza, and to insert in a private act a clause which legitimatised the installation of bishops by the metropolitan or the oldest prelate of the province.

These concessions not having satisfied the emperor, the bishops received orders to hold a council on the 17th of June, 1811. Several preparatory meetings took place before the solemn session; what strangely surprised Napoleon, was the violent opposition manifested in it to his edicts. He was ignorant, that it was the habit of the clergy, in its spirit of rule, to turn against their protectors the authority they have been imprudent enough to grant them. Perceiving then that a majority of the bishops was imbued with ultramontane maxims, he closed the council at its first session, and arrested the bishops of Tours, Ghent, and Tournay, who had openly declared themselves to be the agents of Pius the Seventh. This proceeding rendered more docile a new meeting of the prelates which took place in the palace of the archbishop of Paris on the 5th of the following August; the fathers there decided the question in regard to episcopal institution, in compliance with the desires of the emperor. It was supposed that his holiness would oppose the principles of the Gallican church; it was not so; he declared that the opinion of the prelates was in accordance with his own; he joined to his brief, instructions concerning the manner in which bishops should conduct themselves in conferring the institution of the metropolitan, and passed high eulogiums on the fathers for the wisdom they had evinced in so delicate an affair. He even went further, and addressed a private letter to Napoleon, called him his most dear son, emperor and king, lavished on him the most fulsome epithets, and terminated by entreating him not to oppose a reconciliation. He, however, avoided touching on the causes which induced his disgrace, and particularly on the extension Napoleon wished to give the concordat, by applying it to the provinces of the French empire, to Rome itself, to the states annexed to the kingdom of Italy, to Holland, Hamburg, and the Rhenish provinces. The wary pontiff had calculated that such a step would not compromise his position, and would force his enemy to set him at liberty; his hopes were deceived; the emperor did not reply to his letters, and sent the bishops to their respective dioceses without taking the trouble to close the council.

Napoleon then had on hand more serious subjects of apprehension than the subjugation of a pope; he was engaged in immense preparations for war, and in his gigantic plan for the invasion of Russia. But before commencing this brilliant and disastrous campaign, he sent orders to the court of Turin, to transfer the holy father into France. His holiness made no protest, started with an escort, and arrived on the 20th of June, 1812, at Fontainebleau, which had been fixed upon as his place of residence. The princes of the church who dwelt at Paris, and were called the red cardinals, were permitted to go and make their court to him; the black cardinals, so called because they had been deprived of their purple by the emperor for having refused to be present at his marriage with Maria Louisa, were alone excluded.

After the unfortunate retreat from Moscow, Napoleon returned to France, and was immediately occupied with resuming negotiations with the pope. He went to Fontainebleau, and fixed the basis of a new concordat, which was acceded to by his holiness. The principal conditions were, "That Pius the Seventh should exercise spiritual functions in France and Italy, as his predecessors had done; that ambassadors and other envoys near the Holy See, should be regarded as members of the diplomatic body; that the pontifical domains not then alienated, should remain the pro-party of the pope, and should be administered by his agents; that he should be allowed for the alienated domains, a revenue of two millions of francs; that the emperor should have six months to nominate to the vacant sees; that the metropolitans should make the necessary inquiries into the merits of the nominee; that the pope should institute him in the six months following the notification; that, neglecting this, the right of investiture should revert to the metropolitan or oldest bishop of the province; that the propaganda, the penitentiary, and the archives should be established in the place where the pope was sojourning; that the latter should renounce the sovereignty of Rome, and consent to transfer the Holy See into France." The two contracting parties solemnly signed the treaty on the 25th of January, 1813. Festivals were given in celebration of this happy event, and Pius the Seventh embraced Napoleon, although he was not yet relieved from his excommunication. This agreement was of short duration; the cardinal ministers having been set at liberty, and having received permission to join the pope, the intrigues recommenced. Pacca and Gonzalvi frightened the pontiff about the consequences of the concordat which he had signed, and induced him to take an extreme resolution, to protest against his own acts, to revoke what he had done, to afford to the Christian world the scandalous sight of a pope giving the lie to his own infallibility.

His holiness then wrote to the emperor on the 24th of March, that is, two months after the signing of the concordat, to inform him of his new determination. "It is the spirit of darkness, it is Satan, who prompted to me all the articles of that concordat! . . . The most bitter repentance, the greatest remorse, rend my soul, which has neither truce nor peace; I retract, as Pascal the Second retracted the promises he had made to Henry the Fifth, emperor of Germany; and I protest that I will not agree to any treaty until I am restored to all my rights, spiritual and temporal. . . ."

Napoleon, irritated at the very bad faith of the pontiff, paid no attention to this declaration, and issued a decree to maintain the concordat. This measure would, without doubt, have led to great disorders in the church, and produced a schism, if political events had not turned aside the general attention from ecclesiastical affairs.

For the fifth time, the foreign sovereigns, subsidised by the gold of England, had formed a new coalition, and were preparing to invade France. Hordes of Russians, Austrians, English, Prussians, Swedes, Hollanders, Danes, Spaniards, Neapolitans, and Portuguese had united to crush the great nation, and formed several armies, whose total amounted to more than eleven hundred thousand men. Napoleon, perceiving the necessity of not leaving a fire place of discord in the heart of the empire, and being unable to conquer the obstinacy of the pope, authorised his return to Rome.

His holiness had scarcely arrived in his

states when great changes took place in France. Napoleon had succumbed; the Bourbons had returned at the rear of the baggage waggons of the foreign armies, and Louis the Eighteenth was enthroned at the Tuilleries. Pius the Seventh hastened to write to the new king to congratulate him on his happy advent. After this he persecuted the Italian patriots who had sided with the French; he condemned some of them to banishment, others to the galleys, most to death. The fanatical priests also thought of having a festival after their own fashion, in honour of the return of the holy father; they preached a crusade against the republicans, distributed holy daggers to murder the heretics, and in their furious excitement, designated the Israelites to public vengeance, and demanded from the pope authority "to eat a roast Jew." The interference of the ambassadors of the powers were necessary to prevent the cannibals from executing their horrible plan. The Israelites saved their lives, but not their fortunes. His holiness confiscated their property, overloaded them with imposts, and shut them up like a herd of unclean animals, in a separate quarter called "Ghetto."

Pius the Seventh was then engaged in an act which the satellites of despotism regarded as most important, the restoration of the odious Society of Jesus. He published for this purpose, on the day of the octave of the feast of St. Ignatius Loyola, the following bull: "The Catholic world, with one voice, demands the re-establishment of the Jesuits; it recognises the abundant fruits which these apostles have produced in every country. . . . The dispersion of the very stones of the sanctuary in these last periods of calamities, the annihilation of the discipline of the religious orders, the glory of the Catholic religion, exact that we should yield to the wishes of the whole people by reorganising this sacred militia. We should believe ourselves guilty before God of great dereliction of duty, if in the great dangers of the Christian republic, we neglected the aid which the special providence of Christ grants us; and if placed in the bark of St. Peter, agitated and assailed by continual tempests, we refused to employ vigorous and experienced rowers, offering of themselves to break the waves of a sea which each moment threatens the papacy with shipwreck and death. . . . Induced by such powerful motives, we have decreed, of certain knowledge, by virtue of the plenitude of our apostolic power, and as lasting for ever, that all the concessions, privileges, faculties, and rights granted to the Jesuits of the Russian empire, and of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, shall hereafter extend to the use of our ecclesiastical states, and also to all those of other kingdoms. . . ."

This bull was immediately sent to France, with the wax candles for Candlemas day, which his holiness sent to the royal family; but in the interval singular events had transpired. Napoleon had left the island of Elba, which had been assigned to him by the allies for his residence, had disembarked on the shores of France, and reconquered his throne. The Bourbons had fled in disgrace from Paris, and had gone towards Ghent. The sovereign pontiff was extremely alarmed on learning this unhopcd-for return of Bonaparte to power; no longer believing himself in safety at Rome, he hastened to leave it with his court, and went to Genoa. There he received a letter from the emperor, which was a model of wisdom and mildness.

"Most holy father," wrote Napoleon, "you have heard during the last month of my return to France, my entrance into Paris, and of the departure of the Bourbons. The true nature of these events ought, however, to be known to you; they are the work of an irresistible power, the work of the unanimous will of a great nation, which knows its rights and its duties. The dynasty which foreign bayonets imposed on the French people was no longer made for it. The Bourbons have been unwilling to associate themselves in sentiments, wants, and morals with them; the people determined to separate from them. Their voice called a liberator; I hastened to them. From the moment I touched the shore, the love of my people has carried me to the bosom of the capital. The first care of my heart is to repay so much affection by the maintenance of an honourable tranquillity. The restoration of the imperial throne was necessary for the happiness of the French; my sweetest thought is to render it at the same time useful to the tranquillity of Europe.

"Enough glory has by turns illustrated the flags of the different nations; the vicissitudes of fate have sufficiently made great reverses succeed great successes; a more beautiful arena is now opened to sovereigns, and I am the first to descend into it. After having presented to the world the sight of great combats, it will be sweeter to know hereafter no other rivalry than that of the advantages of peace, no other strife than that of the happiness of the people. France is pleased to proclaim sincerely this noble end of all its wishes; jealous of its own independence, the invariable principle of its policy will be the most absolute respect for the independence of other nations. If such are, as I believe, the paternal sentiments of your beatitude, tranquillity is assured for a long period, and justice, seated on the confines of different states, will alone be sufficient to guard the frontiers."

Such were the sublime sentiments which animated the great soul of Napoleon, but which were not shared by the allied kings. Thus the war recommenced more terribly than ever. England made desperate efforts, subsidised, with all her means, hostile armies, opened her treasures for treasons of all kinds, and then cast a million of men on the French territory. The battle of Waterloo put an end to this struggle; Napoleon, defeated, not by fortune, but by the treason of his generals, abdicated the crown and surrendered to the English; magnanimous imprudence, which he paid for with his liberty, his life. The wretches, in contempt of the laws of nations, dared to retain him a captive, to conduct him to a rock in the midst of the seas, in a fatal climate, to torture, to assassinate him.

On the first news of the reverses which the armies of the emperor had experienced, his holiness returned in triumph to Rome; as soon as he was installed in the Quirinal palace, he appointed ambassadors to go to compliment Louis the Eighteenth, on his return to France. The cardinal legate, Hercules Gonzalvi, and the sculptor Canova, were sent on this mission; they were at the same time to present to the allied sovereigns, briefs to obtain the entire restitution of the provinces of which the pope had been despoiled, as well as the pictures, statues, and objects of art which had been carried off from the museum at Rome; they were also to solicit the recall of the Jesuits into France. All these things were granted to the sovereign pontiff. The provinces were soon invaded by swarms of the black disciples of Ignatius Loyola; at Bordeaux, St. Anne, Forcalquier, Montmorin colleges were opened under the direction of the good fathers; shortly after, their number was increased by all those who were driven from Russia by Alexander, and who fell upon Dole, Laval, Vitry, Avignon, and especially Paris.

Pius the Seventh, satisfied of the submission of Louis the Eighteenth, supposed that he could push his encroachments still farther, and presented to him a concordat, based upon that of Leo the Tenth with Francis the First, that is to say, which made France retrograde three centuries. The king signed it, but did not wish to make it obligatory on his clergy, either from not caring to place himself beneath the feet of a spiritual father, who had so long treated him as a younger son, or from fear of the refusal of the sanction of the legislative chamber, in which all regard for the public good was not extinguished.

His holiness, still more encouraged by the success of these efforts to go on, intrigued actively at the Congress of Vienna, and was placed in possession of the three provinces, the March of Ancona, Macerata, and Zermo, of the duchies of Camerino, Beneventum, and Ponte Corvo, as well as the provinces of Romagna, Bologna, and Ferrara, known by the name of the three legations, and even claimed some cities of this last legation situated beyond the Po, as well as the city of Avignon, and the Venaissin country.

The fatal influence of the court of Rome was already extending itself over the different kingdoms of Europe; the senate of Savoy had received its atrocious old laws, and restored the afflictive and infamous penalties of barbarous ages against blasphemers; Bavaria had signed a concordat with the pope; the emperor had done the same for the kingdom of Poland; the king of the Two Sicilies, Ferdinand the Seventh, was forced to grant compensations to the Holy See for the suppression of the disgraceful tribute of a hackney; the protestant princes of Germany found themselves vigorously pressed, solicited, and threatened to permit the Jesuits to enter their dominions; from all quarters, was at last announced the restoration of the papacy. Fortunately, the Catholic and protestant princes of the states of the Germanic confederacy were alarmed by the progress of the court of Rome. To avoid a collision, they arranged among themselves the principle of unlimited freedom of worship, and proposed a concordat, established on this basis, to the pontiff. He refused to adhere, under the pretence that such a treaty would compromise his temporal and spiritual power; they went on, notwithstanding his censures. The holy father then walked with erect head in the path of reactions; he rallied around him the kings of the holy alliance, declared a terrible war against liberal ideas, fulminated excommunications against the democrats of France, the illuminati of Germany, the radicals of England, and the Carbonari of Italy; he persecuted liberal writers to the utmost, and even pushed his vengeance so far as to persecute a venerable old man, the virtuous Llorente, the author of the History of the Inquisition of Spain, who had taken refuge at Paris. At the instigation of Monseigneur Macchi, the apostolic nuncio, the minister of police sent to this venerable octogenarian, already a great invalid, an order to quit France in a few days, though it was then mid-winter. Llorente obeyed, started, and died before reaching the frontier.

God struck the persecutor in his turn. On the 6th of July, 1822, Pius the Seventh fell in his chamber and broke his hip; all the aid of science could not cure him, and he died on the 20th of April, 1823, in the eighty-first year of his age, after having reigned twenty-three years, five months, and six days. His funeral was celebrated with the usual pomp, and his coffin was deposited, as usual, in the sarcophagus, in which the dead awaits the living pontiff.

LEO THE TWELFTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTIETH POPE.

[A. D. 1823.]

Inclusive and exclusive factions in the conclave—Annibal della Genga is proclaimed pope by the name of Leo the Twelfth—His history before his exaltation—He excites the king of Spain to violent measures against the Cortes—Pastoral letter of the archbishop of Toulouse—Resistance in France to the progress of ultra montanism—Sickness of the holy father—He proclaims the opening of the universal jubilee—Churches of Germany, Switzerland, England, and Ireland—Encyclical letter of the pope—The Jesuits obtain the exclusive privilege of teaching in the states of the church—Death of Louis the Eighteenth—Advent of Charles the Tenth to the throne of France—Opening of the holy door—Speculations of the pontiff in indulgences—Fanaticism of the Jesuit missionaries in France—Considerable wealth extorted by the pope during the jubilee of 1825—Presents from his holiness to the royal family—The Jesuits persecute the liberal press—The last auto-da-fe celebrated in Spain—Knaveries of the priests in France—Miracle of the cross at Migné—Efforts of the Jesuits to seize on instruction in France—Struggle between them and the university—Ordinances against them—The Catholics of England and Ireland—Death of Leo the Twelfth.

We think it useful, at a time when every thing is presaging the imminent ruin of the papacy, to explain the usages which govern the sacred college, and to transmit to posterity the regulations which are established for the elections of the head of the church, before they have fallen into forgetfulness. The cardinals are divided into three classes; the first comprises six cardinals, called suburban; these are the prelates of Sabine, Frascati, Porto, St. Rufinus, Veletri, Palestrina, and Albano; the second includes fifty cardinal priests, among whom are bishops of different nations; the third is composed of fourteen cardinal deacons; but this number of sixty-six princes of the church is never full; the sacred college usually contains from fifty-five to sixty members. The pope must, to procure an election, obtain one more than two-thirds of all the votes. On the opening of the conclave, the cardinals divide into two sections, called the inclusive and exclusive. The first, composed principally of Italians, who are always in a majority, has for its aim to unite electors enough to choose a pope from among its number; the exclusive is formed of foreign prelates, and of those who have not yet sold their votes; by way of opposition, it endeavours to organise a minority to prevent the election. Moreover, France, Spain, and Austria exercise a right of exclusion, that is to say, they can reject a candidate who has obtained a majority, if he is not agreeable to them; but this right having been exercised once by each power, they are then compelled to accept the choice which is made.

Sixteen days after the death of Pius the Seventh, fifty cardinals entered the conclave to give him a successor. The intrigues, which had been very animated before the meeting of the sacred college, still continued for twenty-six days. At last the cardinal Annibal della Genga, prevailed over his competitors, and was proclaimed pope by the name of Leo the Twelfth. The choice had fallen on a prelate only sixty-three years old, which appeared to be a departure from the habits of the cardinals, who usually elevated to the Holy See, out of preference, titularies who were bowed by age, and inclining to the tomb. But Annibal made up for this defect by languishing health and precocious infirmities, the fruits of the debauchery of his youth, which made them foresee that he would not preserve for a long time the deposit which had been confided to him.

The new pontiff was born in the diocese of Fabriano; his father was named Hilary Count della Genga, and his mother Louisa Periberti. His parents had made him embrace the ecclesiastical state in his youth, in which he was not long in raising himself to the highest dignities, by means of his intrigues with the Roman courtisans, and his liaisons with the bastards of the incestuous Pius the Sixth. He had obtained from that pope the title of archbishop of Tyre, and the nuncioship of Cologne. Under Pius the Seventh he had been accredited as nuncio extraordinary near the diet of Ratisbon, to defend the interests of the court of Rome, and was sent afterwards to Napoleon, to bring the powerful emperor of the French into the interests of the pope. In this last mission the prelate had been distinguished for his baseness and servility; he constantly loaded Napoleon with the most extravagant praises; called him the imperial hero, the new Charlemagne, the regenerator of the world; he proclaimed him to be the strongest among the great, the most glorious among the powerful, the predestined of God from all eternity. . . . Which did not prevent him, when fortune turned, when Napoleon was constrained to yield the throne to the Bourbons, from presenting himself at the court of Louis the Eighteenth, in the capacity of extraordinary nuncio, and congratulating him that the god of armies had led him, as it were, by the hand to the throne of his ancestors, to put an end to the tribulations of the Catholic church, that holy spouse of Christ, which had not ceased to lament over the evils caused by the usurper.

On his return to Italy, Annibal was promoted to the cardinalate, and obtained besides the post of vicar general to his holiness. He was already archpriest of St. Mary Majora, prefect of the congregation of the residences of bishops, of ecclesiastical immunity, and of the spiritual affairs of the Roman college and seminary, and was accumulating enormous benefices. He had acquired a very great influence over the mind of Pius the Seventh, and had contributed powerfully to restore the barbarous practices abolished during the sojourn of the French, the strappado, the rack, and the odious tortures employed by the holy inquisition.

Such were the antecedents of this fanatical priest. Having become pope, he wished to finish the work commenced by his predecessor, annihilate liberty, and cause civilization to retrograde to the ages of barbarism. He addressed congratulations to the king of Spain, Ferdinand the Seventh, a knavish, cowardly, and perjured prince, in regard to his restoration, and to Louis the Eighteenth, for the aid he had lent that monarch in men and money, to induce the triumph of despotism. He then essayed to extend his influence over France, and excited the cardinal Clermont Tonnere, archbishop of Toulouse, who was at Rome, to draw up a pastoral letter for his flock, which he could use as a pilot balloon, to enable his holiness to judge of the state of men's minds. The prelate, in his letter, asked for legislative modifications, so that the laws of the kingdom should be in harmony with those of the church, that is, should concur in subjugating and stupefying the nation. He demanded the restoration of solemn festivals, or Catholic rests; the restoration of a great number of religious orders of that monkish militia, which had for centuries weighed down the nation, devoured the substance of the people, and corrupted their morals. He also claimed the independence of the ministry, that is, that they should restore to the priests the rich domains which had been extorted from weak souls, and of which the republic had despoiled them; finally, he wished the suppression of the organic laws.

All France was in an uproar on the appearance of this pastoral letter. The writers of the opposition denounced it as encroaching on the constitutional liberties, consecrated by the charter, and used such energetic language, that Louis the Eighteenth was constrained to issue a royal ordinance, which declared this letter abusive, and suppressed it, as contrary to the laws of the kingdom, the prerogatives and independence of the crown.

In the mean while Leo the Twelfth fell sick, and so badly, that the cardinals hoped for a short time that he would yield to the attack; but he recovered, and after some months of convalescence, was enabled to resume the course of his apostolic labours. One of his first cares was to promulgate the bull "Quod hoc ineunte sæculo," which announced the opening of the universal jubilee, for the year 1825, in order to revive the trade in dispensations, indulgences, benefices, and absolutions, which had become much discredited since the French revolution. He also desired to make his influence predominant in protestant countries, now by allying himself with the people against the sovereigns, now by making common cause with the latter, according as his policy required. He succeeded, in this way, in producing serious collisions in the cantons of Berne, Geneva, and Vaud; in several German states, in Hanover, and in Ireland. He then attacked the philosophical and liberal schools, whose progress caused great inquietude to the Holy See, and denounced it to the vengeance of nations in an encyclical letter. His holiness thus expressed himself

"There is a sect, my brethren, who, arrogating wrongfully to themselves the name of philosophy, have rekindled from their ashes the dispersed phalanxes of errors. This sect, covered externally by the flattering appearances of piety and liberality, professes toleration, or rather indifference, and interferes not only with civil affairs, but even with those of religion; teaching that God has given entire freedom to every man, so that each one can, without endangering his safety, embrace and adopt the sect or opinion which suits his private judgment. . . . This doctrine, though seducing and sensible in appearance, is profoundly absurd; and I cannot warn you too much against the impiety of these maniacs. . .

"What shall I say more? The iniquity of the enemies of the Holy See is so increased, that besides the deluge of pernicious books with which they inundate Europe, it goes so far as to turn the religion of the holy scriptures to detriment. A society, commonly called the Bible Society, spreads itself audaciously over the whole earth, and in contempt of the traditions of the holy fathers, in opposition to the celebrated decree of the council of Trent, which prohibits the holy scriptures from being made common, it publishes translations of them in all the languages of the world. Several of our predecessors have made laws to turn aside this scourge; and we also, in order to acquit ourselves of our pastoral duty, urge the shepherds to remove their flocks carefully from these mortal pasturages. . . . Let God arise: let him repress, confound, annihilate this unbridled license of speaking, writing, and publishing—."

His holiness wished to create powerful auxiliaries for himself in the strife on which he was about to enter, and naturally thought of the Jesuits. He loaded the good fathers with honours and wealth, in order to attach them the more to his cause; he yielded and assigned for ever to the company and its general, Louis Fortis, the Roman college, with the church of St. Ignatius, several convents, the oratory called that of Father Caravita, the museum, the library, the observatory, and all the dependencies. He invested them, moreover, with the exclusive privilege of teaching, and published a constitution in regard to the mode of directing education in the ecclesiastical states.

Once entered on the path of reform, the fanatical Leo the Twelfth did not confine himself to the first regulations. He made edicts about the simplest things—about costumes, furniture, equipages, spectacles, balls. Rome soon assumed a lugubrious and funereal aspect, as in the time of the fierce Pius the Fifth, of sanguinary memory. The irksome ceremonies of religion replaced the most innocent pleasures; holy spies swarmed, night and day, through the city of the Cæsars, to surprise the delinquents, and watch over families. The pontifical censure extended as far as the toilette of the females. Severe penalties were inflicted on all the Roman ladies, who permitted their noble and graceful forms to be robed in gauze. He even went still further, and mounted up to the source of the delinquency of coquetry, and prohibited mantua makers, seamstresses, and milliners from making dresses low in the neck, under penalty of excommunication.

Whilst Leo the Twelfth was playing his part as pope at Rome, Louis the Eighteenth was finishing his reign, and leaving the throne of France to the count d'Artois, his brother, an old rake, who had become a hypocrite, a bigot recruit and ally of the Jesuits; the new sovereign took the name of Charles the Tenth.

Three months after this event, the jubilee opened; Leo the Twelfth went, as usual on Christmas eve, to the porch of the church of St. Peter in great state, covered with a mantle of silver, an emblem of the rich harvest on which he counted, he struck three times on the casing of the door, which fell inward and left a free passage to the imbecile devotees who desired to carry their offerings.

Although it was no longer in those fine times of the church in which the publication of the jubilee made so much wealth flow into Rome that the cellars of the Vatican could not contain it, still the pope had cause to be satisfied. The Jesuits knew admirably how to take advantage of the superstition of the Catholics. They organised missions, traversed the cities, villages, smallest boroughs, planted crosses, preached in the open air, fanaticised the populace, and every where extorted money from the faithful. Independently of these extraordinary means, Leo the Twelfth had conceived the idea, in order to increase his treasures, to set in vigour the taxes of the apostolic chancellery for the redemption of crimes, which had not fortunately succeeded with him. He was heard to say, on the occasion of this measure, to the cardinals who remonstrated with him on the danger of giving just pretexts to the enemies of the papacy to declaim against the abuse, "Bah! fear nothing; we will bring all the writers to reason. I act to-day with money for religion, in order to act to-morrow for religion with money."

In fact, he expended, generously, a very large sum in the purchase of a sword, and a cap ornamented with precious stones, which he sent to the stupid duke of Angoulême, the eldest son of Charles the Tenth. He joined to them, for the dauphiness, the silver mantle with which he had opened the holy door, as well as magnificent medals; and for Madame, the widow of the duke de Berri, the second son of the king, two cameos in agate, representing the Saviour and St. Peter, and two reliquaries containing, the one, a piece of the wood of the manger in which Christ was born; the other, a piece of the stone of the tomb of the chief of the apostles. There were very many at the court of France who were incredulous about these two last objects. The prince and princesses were, nevertheless, flattered by the presents of his holiness, and, in exchange, they promised to second Charles the Tenth with all their power in the war which he had declared against the press. They could only proceed, however, gently, on account of the universal repulsion which ultramontanism excited, and especially on account of the institutions of the country.

But in Spain things went on faster; the priests, not being restrained as in France, by constitutional laws, cast themselves with a species of fury on the path of Catholic reaction; the frightful inquisition, which had been re-established since the return of the fanatical Ferdinand the Seventh, confined thousands of victims in its prisons. The Jesuits went still farther; at Valencia they celebrated an auto-da-fe, and burned an unfortunate Jew, who was condemned as a relapsed heretic, with all the pomp used in the fine times of Ferdinand the Catholic and Philip the Fifth, under the terrible inquisitors, Torquemada and Don Diego Sarmiento de Balladarès. This atrocious execution took place in the beginning of the year 1826. Leo the Twelfth, to his disgrace, gratified with the plenary indulgences of a special jubilee those who had co-operated in or merely assisted at the punishment of the Israelite, and declared in his bull that the presence of a Catholic at an auto-da-fe, was equivalent to a hundred stations in a hundred different churches.

His holiness being unable to act in the same way in Germany and France, and impose silence on the incredulous through terror, was obliged to have recourse to other means; he ordered the Jesuits to perform miracles. A fanatical prince, who had embraced the ecclesiastical state, named Hohenlohe, was commissioned to perform cures in the different circles of the Germanic confederacy, and acquitted himself admirably. In France, where they feared lest too rigorous investigations should be made about the sick, the Jesuits acted differently; they chose a small hamlet, called Migné, in the diocese of Poitiers, which was inhabited by poor peasants, as the theatre of their miracles, and one night, at the close of the religious exercises, on the 17th of December, 1826, they made a phenomenal cross appear in the air. There being no one there to unmask the imposture, all those present were convinced of the existence of the prodigy, and cried out, a miracle. The clergy made a great noise about it, and used it to extend their moral influence. The pope, on his side, did not fail to show the lively interest which he took in the miracle, and sent to the humble church of Migné a golden cross, containing a piece of the true cross. From that moment the good fathers thought that every thing was allowed them; they entered upon an open strife with the university, and sought to seize on the exclusive education of youth. The university defended itself, addressed energetic remonstrances to the deputies, and had the ministry of public instruction taken away from Count Frayssinous, bishop of Hermopolis, who was secretly affiliated to the congregation. The new minister, the grand master of the university, immediately commenced purging the primary instruction from those mitigated Jesuits, known by the name of Brothers of the Christian School; he then drew up a report to the king, to put an end to the encroachments of the Jesuits, and to have the execution of the laws of the kingdom assured, in all the secondary ecclesiastical schools. Charles the Tenth, forced to make a concession to public opinion, authorised the formation of a commission, to decide on the measures to be taken to make clerical instruction accord with political legislation, and the maxims of the French public law. This commission came to a kind of agreement, and yielded several points to the university, in order to obtain permission for the Jesuits to have a certain number of colleges freed from the supervision of government. Fortunately, the chamber of deputies refused to ratify this arrangement, and decided that all the colleges kept by the good fathers, should be submitted to university regulations, especially those of Billom, Aix, Bourdeaux, Dôle, Forcalquier, Montmorillon St. Anne d'Auray, and St. Acheul; and, moreover, that no one could hereafter be employed either in directing or teaching, in a house of education, which was dependent on the university, or even on the secondary ecclesiastical schools, unless he first declared in writing that he did not belong to any religious congregation.

Leo the Twelfth wrote at once to the disciples of Ignatius Loyola, to console them for the check they had experienced; he at the same time addressed strong remonstrances to Charles the Tenth, on his weakness, and enjoined on him to try a stroke of state policy, in defence of the altar.

The holy father had not the happiness to see his wishes hearkened to; he soon afterwards became very ill, and breathed his last on the 10th of February, 1829, about ten o'clock in the morning.

PIUS THE EIGHTH, THE TWO HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIRST POPE.

[A. D. 1829.]

Election of Pius the Eighth—History of Cardinal Castiglioni before his elevation to the throne of the apostle—Synodical letter of his holiness—Revolt of the inhabitants of Imola—Catholic emancipation in Ireland and England—O'Connell, the first Catholic admitted into the house of commons—He demands the repeal of the union and a separate parliament for his own country—Pius the Eighth recognises the usurper, Don Miguel, as the lawful sovereign of Portugal—Blasphemers put to the torture by the inquisition of Spain—Pragmatic sanction of the protestant princes of Germany—The Camarilla at the court of Charles the Tenth—French revolution—Fall and flight of Charles the Tenth—The duke of Orleans is proclaimed king of the French, by the name of Louis Philippe the First—His holiness refuses to recognise the new king—Negotiations on the subject—Death of Pius the Eighth.

AFTER forty-nine days of vacancy in the Holy See, and thirty-six days of struggles and intrigues in the conclave, the cardinals united their suffrages on Francis Xavier Castiglioni, who was proclaimed pope by the name of Pius the Eighth.

The new head of the church was in his sixty-eighth year; he was born at Cingoli, a small town, situated near Orsino, in the states of the church, on the 20th of November, 1761. His parents, who had remarked in him, from his earliest youth, a supple, servile character, joined to much astuteness, had sent him to Rome, to remove him from them, and make a priest of him. This aversion, which Castiglioni inspired in his family, was the cause of his high fortune. Having entered on the ecclesiastical career, he made rapid progress in it. In the year 1800 he was made bishop of Monte Alto, a small city of the March of Ancona, by Pius the Seventh. In 1808 he obtained the hat and the bishopric of Cesena; in 1821 he passed into the order of cardinal bishops, and became the titular of the suburban see of Frascati; he was finally made grand penitentiary and prefect of the congregation of the Index. Having become sovereign pontiff, he considered it an honour to show that he would continue the policy of his predecessors, and would pursue the impious work of subjugating the people. He addressed the following circular letter to the bishops of Christendom, to inform them of his detestable intentions, and to excite them to lend him assistance.

"It is your duty, venerable brethren, to turn all your attention towards the secret societies of factious men, of fierce republicans, the declared enemies of God and kings, who apply themselves wholly to desolating the church, to destroying states, to troubling the universe, and who, by breaking the bridle of the true faith and passive obedience to princes, open the way to all crimes. We ourselves labour with all our might, that the church and public matters should not suffer from the attempts of these mysterious sects, who, by virtue of oaths of darkness, seek to hurl religion and empires into the abyss. But these are not the only dangers to which the altar and the throne are exposed; the children of the age sap these two divine institutions by other means, which, if less violent, are no less dangerous. We speak of these innumerable errors which the press is scattering about, of those false and perverse doctrines which attack the Catholic faith, no longer secretly and in the dark, but boldly and openly. We say it weeping; yes, the roaring lions have cast themselves upon Israel; yes, they have united against God, against his Christ, and his ministers; yes, these impious have exclaimed, 'Destroy the church, destroy it even to its foundations.' It is thither that the dark manœuvres of the sophists of this age tend, of those philosophers who maintain that the Catholic religion is but a tissue of absurd falsehoods, of ridiculous superstitions, invented by corrupt, greedy, and impostor priests, in order to degrade the nations. We must, venerable brethren, pursue these dangerous sophists; we must denounce their works to the tribunals; we must hand over their persons to the inquisitors, and recall them by tortures to the sentiments of the true faith of the spouse of Christ."

The exhortations of his holiness awakened the zeal of the Italian prelates, and gave fresh alimient to the war against the liberals. The cardinal Justiniani, bishop of Imola, was distinguished among others by a display of excessive rigour, so that the populace interfered and rose in insurrection to put an end to his atrocities.

Other events, produced by very different causes, but which were equally favourable to the extension of the Holy See, were occurring in the kingdom of Great Britain; the Irish Catholics had constrained George the Fourth to decree their political emancipation, and to render them competent to sit and vote in the two houses of parliament, and exercise all civil and military functions, on the sole condition that they should take an oath of fidelity to the king, the state, and the protestant succession, and should abjure all fealty or allegiance to any foreign power.

The immediate result of the emancipation bill was to introduce into parliament the celebrated Daniel O'Connell, one of the most rumours are circulated on this subject; that Gregory the Sixteenth is openly designated as the father of the children of Cajetanina, and that the disguised exile of a cardinal appointed to the legation of Ravenna is attributed to a fit of jealousy; that in the circles of the city an anecdote is related concerning a young nurse of Tivoli, remarkably handsome, attached to the family of the chamberlain, who had for a short time attracted the attention of his holiness; that the intemperance of the sovereign pontiff is publicly blamed; that he is accused of living like an epicurean, and of getting drunk every night on the wine of Orvieto, which he corrects, it is said, with champagne, to weaken it.

But what concerns us chiefly to know is, the species of religious crusade undertaken by the court of Rome against the new order of ideas; it is the redoubled audacity of the ultra montane clergy; it is the brutal appeal which the pope makes to force, to stifle the germs of liberty in the heart of the people of Italy; it is the execrable bull issued by Gregory the Sixteenth against the Israelites.

"All the Jews," says his holiness in this edict, "who reside at Ancona and at Sinigaglia, shall no longer receive Catholic nurses, nor engage Christians in their service, under penalty of being punished conformably with the pontifical decrees. All the Israelites shall sell, within three months, their moveable and immoveable property, if they do not wish it sold at auction. None of them shall reside in a city without the authority of the government; in case of contravention, they shall be sent into their respective ghettos. No Israelite shall sleep out of his ghetto, nor induce a Christian to sleep in that accursed enclosure, nor carry on friendly relations with the faithful, nor trade in sacred ornaments, nor books of any kind, under a penalty of a fine of a hundred crowns and of seven years imprisonment. The Israelites, in interring their dead, shall not make use of any ceremony, nor shall they use torches under penalty of confiscation. Those who shall violate our edicts, shall incur the penalties of the holy inquisition. The present measure shall be communicated in the ghetto, to be published in the synagogue.

"The chancellery of the holy inquisition, June 24th, 1843.

"Fra Vincenzo Salina, Inquisitor General."

It is useful to explain the reason why his holiness speaks only of the Jews of Ancona and Sinigaglia in his bull; it is because in all the cities of the states of the church, these odious measures are rigidly executed; whilst in the legation of Ancona, since the recent occupation by the French in 1832, they had been abolished by General Cubières and his successor General Gazan, who had both, on this occasion, worthily represented France, and employed the temporary authority with which they were invested in that country, for the triumph of progressive ideas.

As is seen, it is the destiny of the papacy to drag itself in a miry and bloody track, to persevere in its struggle against the revolutionary movement, by teaching its detestable doctrines, by its furious attacks on civilization, until it shall have been crushed beneath the wheels of the car of liberty.

[While the preceding work was passing through the press, intelligence was received of the death of Gregory XVI. His demise took place on the 1st of June. He had been indisposed, but at the latter end of May was pronounced entirely recovered; and the suddenness of his demise, it is remarked in European journals, may give occasion to reports similar to those which sprung up upon the deaths of some of his predecessors.

His successor, Cardinal Mastai Ferretti, takes the name of Pius IX. He is only fifty-four years of age, and is therefore one of the youngest cardinals ever elected to the papacy. His election was over before the arrival of the foreign cardinals, the conclave lasting only forty eight hours. On the 21st of June, 1846, the coronation took place. Pius IX. is a member of a noble Italian family, and was born near Ancona. He entered the priesthood very young, and is said to be an able diplomatist.]—Translator.

THE END.

6/12/27

4/12/27

6/13/27

THE NEW YORK PUBLIC LIBRARY
REFERENCE DEPARTMENT

This book is under no circumstances to be taken from the Building

10/15	FEB 20 1926	4-10
	7/22	4/16
MAR 18 1927	1/26	APR 20 1926
NOV 3 1926		4/21-
62618-2 ACH	3-17	5/12
DEC 8	8/19	5/17
2/15/26	3-20	5/31/26
FEB 19 1926	MAR 25 1926	6/7
	MAR 31 1926	6/13
		6/18

FEB 18 1927

MAR 6 1926

JAN 8 1927

MAR 2 - 1927
MAR 4 - 1927

JUN 9 1927

DEC 23 1926

6/14
6/11

NOV 14 1926

NOV 17 1926

NOV 19 1926

NOV 22 1926

NOV 27 1926

LEAD L.B. 1031

DEC 1 1926

12/22

2/27

1/25

1/21

JAN 17 1927

JAN 15 1927

1/17

2/15

2/27

JAN 22 1927

1/24

JAN 24 1927

3/10/27

JAN 24 1927

6/1

JAN 25 1927

6/2

JAN 30 1927

1927 - 1928

3/5

JUN 5 - 1927

1927 - 1928

6/8

2/3

6/24

FEB 1 1927

FEB 1 1927

2/27

7/1

7/21/27

7/27

